

12.7.05

From the Library of Professor Samuel Miller in Memory of Judge Samuel Miller Breckinridge Presented by Samuel Miller Breckinridge Long to the Library of Princeton Theological Seminary

5CC
3457

v. 7

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2011 with funding from Princeton Theological Seminary Library

THE ANCIENT HISTORY

OF THE

EGYPTIANS, CARTHAGINIANS, ASSYRIANS,
BABYLONIANS,

MEDES AND PERSIANS, MACEDONIANS AND GRECIANS.

BY M^R. ROLLIN,

LATE PRINCIPAL OF THE UNIVERSITY OF PARIS, PROFESSOR OF ELOQUENCE IN THE ROYAL COLLEGE, AND MEMBER OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY OF INSCRIPTIONS AND BELLES LETTRES.

—♦—
TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH.
—♦—

IN EIGHT VOLUMES.

=====
VOL. VII.
=====

THE TWELFTH EDITION.
ILLUSTRATED WITH MAPS.

—♦—
BOSTON :

PUBLISHED AND SOLD BY HASTINGS, ETHERIDGE AND BLISS,
No. 8, STATE STREET ; AND AT THE WASHINGTON HEAD, CHARLESTOWN.

.....
1809.

CHARLESTOWN, (MASS.)
PRINTED BY S. ETHERIDGE.

CONTENTS

OF THE SEVENTH VOLUME.

BOOK XVIII. CONTINUED.

THE HISTORY OF ALEXANDER'S SUCCESSORS, CONTINUED.

SECTION VIII.

| | PAGE. |
|--|-------|
| E TOLIANS and Asiatic Gauls subdued by Fulvius and Manlius. Death of Antiochus and Daniel's prophecy, - - - - - | 1 |
| The King's letter to the Marshal d'Asfeldt, | 13 |
| Sect. IX. Seleucus Philopater succeeds Antiochus. Complaints against Philip, - - - - - | 24 |
| X. Philopemen besieges Messene. He is taken prisoner and put to death. Ptolemy Epiphanes dies, - - - - - | 48 |

CHAPTER II.

INCLUDING PART OF THE REIGNS OF PTOLEMY PHILOMETER, PHILIP, AND SELEUCUS PHILOPATER.

| | |
|---|----|
| Sect. I. Perseus conspires against Demetrius. The latter is innocently put to death ; and Perseus succeeds to the throne, - - - - - | 66 |
|---|----|

| | PAGE. |
|--|-------|
| Sect. II. Seleucus Philopater dies and is succeeded by Antiochus Epiphanes. Disturbances in Egypt and Palestine, - - - - - | 107 |
| III. Antiochus's proceedings against the Jews. His armies lose several victories. Is struck by the hand of God, - - - - - | 136 |
| IV. Prophecies of Daniel relating to Antiochus Epiphanes, - - - - - | 163 |
| I. The wars of Antiochus Epiphanes against Egypt, foretold by Daniel the prophet, - - - | ib. |
| Antiochus's first expedition into Egypt, - | 164 |
| Antiochus's second expedition into Egypt, - | 165 |
| Antiochus's third expedition into Egypt, - | 167 |
| Antiochus's fourth expedition into Egypt, - | 169 |
| II. Cruel persecution exercised by Antiochus against the Jews, and foretold by the prophet Daniel, - | 170 |

BOOK XIX.

THE HISTORY OF ALEXANDER'S SUCCESSORS, CONTINUED.

ARTICLE I.

CONTAINING THE WHOLE REIGN OF PERSEUS.

| | |
|--|-----|
| Sect. I. Perseus prepares for war against the Romans. He endeavours a reconciliation with the Acheans, - | 179 |
| II. Licinius and Perseus take the field. The latter has at first considerably the advantage, - - - | 205 |

| | PAGE. |
|---|-------|
| Sect. III. Marcius enters Macedonia. Perseus takes the alarm ; but afterwards resumes courage, - | 224 |
| IV. Emilius's celebrated victory near the city of Pyd- na. Perseus taken prisoner with all his children, 239 | 239 |

ARTICLE II.

FROM THE DEFEAT OF PERSEUS TO THE TAKING AND DE-STRUCTION OF CORINTH BY MUMMIUS.

| | |
|---|-----|
| Sect. I. Attalus comes to Rome to congratulate the Romans upon their success in Macedonia, - - | 298 |
| II. Ariarathes dies, and is succeeded by his son. Death of Eumenes. War between Attalus and Prusias, 318 | 318 |
| III. Andriscus, pretended son of Perseus, causes himself to be proclaimed king of Macedonia, - | 338 |
| IV, Troubles in Achaia. Metellus and Mummius settle those troubles. The latter takes Corinth and destroys it, - - - - - | 343 |
| V. Reflections on the causes of the grandeur, declen- sion, and ruin of Greece, - - - | 359 |
| The four ages of Greece, - - - - | 360 |

ARTICLE III.

FROM THE TWENTIETH YEAR OF PTOLEMY PHILOMETER, TO THE EXPULSION OF PTOLEMY AULETES.

| | |
|--|-----|
| Sect. I. Chronological abridgment of the history of the kings of Egypt and Syria, - - - - | 374 |
| II. Antiochus Eupater succeeds to the kingdom of Syria. Judas Maccabeus's celebrated victories, 384 | 384 |

| | PAGE. |
|--|-------|
| Sect. III. Octavius the Roman ambassador in Syria, is there killed. Death of Judas Maccabeus, - - - | 397 |
| IV. Physcon espouses Cleopatra, and ascends the throne of Egypt, - - - - - | 413 |
| V. Sidetes takes Jerusalem, and then makes war against the Parthians. Physcon's cruelty and death, - - - | 441 |
| VI. Ptolemy Lathyrus succeeds Physcon. Continuation of the wars in Syria and Egypt, - - - | 459 |
| VII. Pompey dispossesses Antiochus Asiaticus of the kingdom of Syria. Troubles in Judea and Egypt, - - - - - | 483 |

BOOK XX.

THE HISTORY OF ALEXANDER'S SUCCESSORS, CONTINUED.

ARTICLE I.

ABRIDGMENT OF THE HISTORY OF THE JEWS, FROM ARISTOBULUS TO HEROD THE IDUMEAN.

| | |
|--|-----|
| Sect. I. Reign of Aristobulus I. which lasted two years, | 502 |
| II. Reign of Alexander Janneus, which continued twenty seven years, - - - - - | 505 |
| III. Reign of Alexandra, the wife of Alexander Janneus, which continued nine years, - - - - - | 510 |
| IV. Reign of Aristobulus II. which continued six years, | 515 |
| V. Reign of Hyrcanus II. which continued twenty four years, | 522 |
| VI. Reign of Antigonus, of only two years duration, | 526 |

BOOK EIGHTEENTH, CONTINUED.

THE

HISTORY

OF

ALEXANDER'S SUCCESSORS.

SECTION VIII.

ETOLIANS AND ASIATIC GAULS SUBDUED BY FULVIUS AND MANLIUS.
DEATH OF ANTIOCHUS, AND DANIEL'S PROPHECY.

DURING the expedition of the Romans in Asia, some commotions had happened in Greece. Amynder, by the aid of the Etolians, was restored to his kingdom of Athamania, after having driven out of his cities the Macedonian garrisons, that held them for king Philip. He deputed some ambassadors to the senate of Rome; and others into Asia, to the two Scipios, who were then at Ephesus, after their signal victory over Antiochus, to excuse his having employed the arms of the Etolians against Philip, and also to make his complaints of that prince.

The Etolians had, likewise, undertaken some enterprises against Philip, in which they had met with tolerable success ; but, when they heard of Antiochus's defeat, and found that the ambassadors they had sent to Rome, were returning from thence, without being able to obtain any of their demands, and that Fulvius, the consul, was actually marching against them, they were seized with real alarms. Finding it would be impossible for them to resist the Romans by force of arms, they again had recourse to entreaties ; and, in order to enforce them, they engaged the Athenians and Rhodians to join their ambassadors to those whom they were going to send to Rome, in order to sue for peace.

* A. M. 3815. Ant. J. C. 189. Liv. l. xxxviii. n. 1—11. Polyb. in Excerpt. Leg. c. 26—28.

The consul being arrived in Greece, he, in conjunction with the Epirots, had laid siege to Ambracia, in which was a strong garrison of Etolians, who had made a vigorous defence. However, being at last persuaded that it would be impossible for them to hold out long against the Roman arms, they sent new ambassadors to the consul, investing them with full powers to conclude a treaty on any conditions. Those which were proposed to them, being judged exceedingly severe, the ambassadors, notwithstanding their full powers, desired that leave might be granted them to consult the assembly once more ; but the members of it were displeased with them for it, and therefore sent them back, with orders to terminate the affair. During this interval, the Athenian and Rhodian ambassadors, whom the senate had sent back to the consul, were come to him, to whom Amynder had also repaired. The latter, having great credit in the city of Ambracia, where he had spent many years of his banishment, prevailed with the inhabitants to surrender themselves, at last, to the consul. A peace was also granted to the Etolians. The chief conditions of the treaty were as follows ; they should first deliver up their arms and horses to the Romans ; should pay them one thousand talents of silver, about an hundred and fifty thousand pounds, half to be paid down directly ; should restore to both the Romans, and their allies, all the deserters and prisoners ; should look upon, as their enemies and friends, all those who were such to the Romans ; in fine, should give up forty hostages, to be chosen by the consul. Their ambassadors being arrived in Rome, to ratify the treaty there, they found the people highly exasperated against the Etolians, as well on account of their past conduct, as the complaints made against them, by Philip, in his letters written on that head. At last, however, the senate were moved by their entreaties, and those of the ambassadors of Athens and Rhodes, who concurred in them ; and, therefore, they ratified the treaty, conformably to the conditions which the consul had prescribed. The Etolians were permitted to pay, in gold, the sum imposed on them, in such a manner, that every piece of gold should be estimated at ten times the value of ten pieces of silver, of the same weight, which shows the proportion between gold and silver at that time.

^b Fulvius, the consul, after he had terminated the war with the Etolians, crossed into the island of Cephalenia, in order to subdue it. All the cities, at the first summons, surrendered immediately. The inhabitants of Same only, after submitting to the conqueror, were sorry for what they had done ; and, accordingly, shut their gates against the Romans, which obliged them to besiege it in form. Some made a very vigorous defence, insomuch that it was four months before the consul could take it.

^b Liv. l. xxxviii. n. 28—30.

From thence he went to Peloponnesus, whither he was called by the people of Egium and Sparta, to decide the differences which interrupted their tranquillity.

The general assembly of the Acheans had, from time immemorial, been held at Egium. But Philopemen, who then was an officer of state, resolved to change that custom, and to cause the assembly to be held successively in all the cities which formed the Achean league ; and, that very year he summoned it to Argos. The consul would not oppose this motion ; and, though his inclination led him to favour the inhabitants of Egium, because he thought their cause the most just ; yet, seeing that the other party would certainly prevail, he withdrew from the assembly, without declaring his opinion.

° But the affair relating to Sparta was still more intricate, and, at the same time, of greater importance. Those, who had been banished from that city by Nabis the tyrant, had fortified themselves in towns and castles along the coast, and from thence infested the Spartans. The latter had attacked, in the night, one of those towns, called Las, and carried it, but were soon after driven out of it. This enterprise alarmed the exiles, and obliged them to have recourse to the Acheans. Philopemen, who, at that time, was in employment, secretly favoured the exiles ; and endeavoured, on all occasions, to lessen the credit and authority of Sparta. On his motion, a decree was enacted, the purport of which was, that Quintius and the Romans, having put the towns and castles of the seacoast of Laconia under the protection of the Acheans, and having forbid the Lacedemonians access to it ; and the latter having, however, attacked the town called Las, and killed some of the inhabitants ; the Achean assembly demanded, that the contrivers of that massacre should be delivered up to them ; and, that otherwise, they should be declared violators of the treaty. Ambassadors were deputed to give them notice of this decree. A demand, made in so haughty a tone, exceedingly exasperated the Lacedemonians. They immediately put to death thirty of those who had held a correspondence with Philopemen, and the exiles ; dissolved their alliance with the Acheans, and sent ambassadors to Fulvius, the consul, who was then in Cephallenia, in order to put Sparta under the protection of the Romans, and to entreat him to come and take possession of it. When the Acheans received advice of what had been transacted in Sparta, they unanimously declared war against that city, which began by some slight incursions, both by sea and land ; the season being too far advanced for undertaking any thing considerable.

The consul, being arrived in Peloponnesus, heard both parties in a public assembly. The debates were exceedingly warm, and carried to a great height on both sides. Without coming to any determination, the first thing he did, was, to command them to lay down their arms, and to send their respective ambassadors to Rome ; and, accordingly, they repaired thither immediately, and were admitted to audience. The league with the Acheans was in great consideration at Rome ; but, at the same time, the Romans did not care to disgust the Lacedemonians entirely. The senate, therefore, returned an obscure and ambiguous answer, which has not come down to us, whereby the Acheans might flatter themselves, that they were allowed full power to infest Sparta ; and, the Spartans, that such power was very much limited and restrained.

The Acheans extended it as they thought proper. Philopemen had been continued in his employment of first magistrate. He marched the army to a small distance from Sparta, without loss of time ; and again demanded to have those persons surrendered to him, who, had concerted the enterprize against the town of Las ; declaring, that they should not be condemned, or punished, till after being heard. Upon this promise, those who had been nominated expressly set out, accompanied by several of the most illustrious citizens, who looked upon their cause as their own, or rather, as that of the public. Being arrived at the camp of the Acheans, they were greatly surprised to see the exiles at the head of the army. The latter, advancing out of the camp, came to them with an insulting air, and began to vent the most injurious expressions against them ; after this, the quarrel growing warmer, they fell upon them with great violence, and treated them very ignominiously. In vain did the Spartans implore both gods and men, and claimed the right of nations ; the rabble of the Acheans, animated by the sedition cries of the exiles, joined with them, notwithstanding the protection due to ambassadors, and in spite of the prohibition of the supreme magistrate. Seventeen were immediately stoned to death, and seventy three rescued by the magistrate out of the hands of those furious wretches. It was not that he intended, in any manner, to pardon them; but he would not have it said, that they had been put to death without being heard. The next day, they were brought before that enraged multitude, who, almost without so much as hearing them, condemned, and executed them all.

The reader will naturally suppose, that so unjust, so cruel a treatment, threw the Spartans into the deepest affliction, and filled them with alarms. The Acheans imposed the same conditions upon them, as they would have done on a city that had been taken by storm. They gave orders that the walls should be demolished; that all such mercenaries as the tyrants had kept in their service, should leave Laconia; that the slaves whom those tyrants had set at liberty, and there were a great number of them, should also be obliged to depart the country in a certain limited time, upon pain of being seized by the Acheans, and sold or carried wheresoever they thought proper; that the laws and institutions of Lycurgus should be annulled. In fine, that the Spartans should be associated in the Achean league, with whom they should thenceforth form but one body, and follow the same customs and usages.

The Lacedemonians were not much afflicted at the demolition of their walls; with which they began the execution of the orders prescribed them; and indeed it was no great misfortune to them. ^d Sparta had long subsisted without any other walls or defence but the bravery of its citizens. ^e Pausanias informs us, that the walls of Sparta were begun to be built^f in the time of the inroads of Demetrius, and afterwards of Pyrrhus; but that they had been completed by Nabis. Livy relates also that the tyrants, for their own security, had fortified with walls, all such parts of the city as were most open and accessible. The Spartans were therefore not much grieved at the demolition of these walls. But it was with inexpressible regret they saw the exiles, who had caused its destruction, returning into it, and who might justly be considered as its most cruel enemies. Sparta, enervated by this last blow, lost all its pristine vigor, and was for many years dependent on, and subjected to the Achæans. ^g The most fatal circumstance with regard to Sparta, was, the abolition of the laws of Lycurgus, which had continued in force seven hundred years, and had been the source of all its grandeur and glory.

^d Fucriat quondam sine muro Sparta. Tyranni nuper locis patentibus planisque objecerant murum; altiora loca et difficiliora aditu stationibus armatorum pro munimento objectis tutabantur. Liv. l. xxxiv. n. 38.

Spartani urbem, quam semper armis non muris defenderant, tum contra responsa fatorum et veterem majorum gloriam, armis diffisi, murorum præsidio includunt. Tantum eos degeneravisse a majoribus, ut cum multis seculis murus urbi civium virtus fuerit, tunc cives salvos se fore non existimaverint, nisi intra muros laterant. Justin. l. xiv. c. 5.

^e In Achaïac. p. 412.

^f Justin informs us, that Sparta was fortified with walls, at the time that Cassander meditated the invasion of Greece.

^g Nulla res tanto erat damno, quam disciplina Lycurgi, cui per septingentos annos assueverant, sublata. Liv.

This cruel treatment of so renowned a city as Sparta, does Philopemen no honour, but, on the contrary, seems to be a great blot in his reputation. Plutarch, who justly ranks him among the greatest captains of Greece, does but just glance at this action, and says only a word or two of it. It must indeed be confessed, that the cause of the exiles was favourable in itself. They had Agesipolis at their head, to whom the kingdom of Sparta rightfully belonged; and they had been all expelled their country by the tyrants; but, so open a violation of the law of nations, to which Philopemen gave at least occasion, if he did not consent to it, cannot be excused in any manner.

^a It appears, from a fragment of Polybius, that the Lacedemonians made complaints at Rome against Philopemen, as having, by this equally unjust and cruel action, defied the power of the republic of Rome, and insulted its majesty. It was a long time before they could obtain leave to be heard. At last,ⁱ Lepidus the consul wrote a letter to the Achean confederacy, to complain of the treatment which the Lacedemonians had met with. However, Philopemen and the Achæans sent an ambassador, Nicodemus of Elis, to Rome, to justify their conduct.

^k In the same campaign, and almost at the same time that Fulvius the consul terminated the war with the Etolians, Manlius, the other consul, terminated that with the Gauls. I have taken notice elsewhere,

^a Polyb. in Legat. c. xxxvii.

ⁱ A. M. 3817. Ant. J. C. 187.

^k Liv. l. xxxviii, n. 12—27. Polyb. in Excerpt. Legat. 29—35.

of the inroad those nations had made into different countries of Europe and Asia under Brennus. The Gauls in question had settled in that part of Asia Minor, called, from their name, Gallo Grecia, or Galatia; and formed three bodies, three different states, the Tolistobogi, the Troceni, and Tectosages. These had made themselves formidable to all the nations round, and spread terror and alarms on all sides. The pretence made use of for declaring war against them, was, their having aided Antiochus with troops. Immediately after L. Scipio had resigned the command of his army to Manlius, the latter set out from Ephesus, and marched against the Gauls. If Eumenes had not been then at Rome, he would have been of great service to him in his march; however, his brother Attalus supplied his place, and was the consul's guide. The Gauls had acquired great reputation in every part of this country, which they had subdued by the power of their arms, and had not met with the least opposition. Manlius judged that it would be necessary to harangue his forces on this occasion, before they engaged the enemy. "I am no ways surprised," says he, "that the Gauls should have made their names formidable to, and spread the strongest terror in the minds of nations, of so soft and effeminate a cast as the Asiatics. Their tall stature, their fair flowing hair, which descends to their waists; their unwieldy bucklers, their long swords; add to this, their songs, their cries, and howlings, at the first onset; the dreadful clashing of their arms and shields; all this may, indeed, intimidate men not accustomed to them; but not you, O Romans, whose victorious arms have so often triumphed over that nation. Besides, experience has taught you, that after the Gauls have spent their first fire, an obstinate resistance blunts the edge of their courage, as well as their bodily strength ; and that then, quite incapable of supporting the heat of the sun, fatigue, dust, and thirst, their arms fall from their hands, and they sink down, quite tired and exhausted. Do not imagine these, the ancient Gauls, inured to fatigues and dangers. The luxurious plenty of the country they have invaded, the soft temperature of the air they breathe, the effeminacy and delicacy of the people among whom they inhabit, have entirely enervated them. They now are no more than Phrygiáns, in Gallic armour ; and the only circumstance I fear is, that you will not reap much honour by the defeat of a rabble of enemies, so unworthy of disputing victory with Romans.”

It was a general opinion, with regard to the ancient Gauls, that a sure way to conquer them, was, to let them exhaust their first fire, which immediately was deadened by opposition ; and that, when once this edge of their vivacity was blunted, they had lost all strength and vigor ; that their bodies were even incapable of sustaining the slightest fatigues long, or of withstanding the sunbeams, when they darted with ever so little violence ; that, as they were more than men in the beginning of an action, they were less than women at the conclusion of it. Gallos primo impetu feroces esse, quos sustinere satis sit ; Gallorum quidem etiam corpora intolerantissima laboris atque æstus fluere; primaque eorum prælia plus quam virorum, postrema minus quam feminarum esse.

¹ Liv. l. x. n. 28.

Those who are not acquainted with the genius and character of the modern French, entertain very near the same idea of them. However, the late transactions in Italy, and especially on the Rhine, must have undeceived them in that particular. Though I am very much prejudiced in favour of the Greeks and Romans, I question whether they ever discovered greater patience, resolution, and bravery, than the French did at the siege of Philipsburgh. I do not speak merely of the generals and officers; courage being natural to, and, in a manner, inherent in them; but, even the common soldiers showed such an ardour, intrepidity, and greatness of soul, as amazed the generals. The sight of an army, formidable by its numbers, and still more so, by the fame and abilities of the prince who commanded it, served only to animate them the more. During the whole course of this long and laborious siege, in which they suffered so much by the fire of the besieged, and the heat of the sun; by the violence of the rains, and inundations of the Rhine; they never once breathed the least murmur or complaint. They were seen wading through great floods, where they were up to the shoulders in water, carrying their clothes and arms over their heads; and, afterwards marching, quite uncovered, on the outside of the trenches, full of water, exposed to the whole fire of the enemy; and then, advancing with intrepidity to the front of the attack, demanding, with the loudest shouts, that the enemy should not be allowed capitulation of any kind; and, to dread no other circumstance, but their being denied the opportunity of signalizing their courage and zeal still more, by storming the city. What I now relate is universally known. The most noble sentiments of honour, bravery, and intrepidity, must necessarily have taken deep root in the minds of our countrymen; otherwise, they could not have roused at once so gloriously in a first campaign, after having been, in a manner, asleep, during a twenty years peace.

The testimony which Lewis XV. thought it incumbent on him to give them, is so glorious to the nation, and even reflects so bright a lustre on the king, that I am persuaded none of my readers will be displeased to find it inserted here entire. If this digression is not allowable in a history like this, methinks it is pardonable, and even laudable, in a Frenchman, fired with zeal for his king and country.

THE KING'S LETTER TO THE MARSHAL D'ASFELDT.

“ COUSIN,

“ I am entirely sensible of the important service you have done me in taking Philipsburgh. Nothing less than your courage and resolution could have surmounted the obstacles to that enterprise, occasioned by the inundations of the Rhine. You have had the satisfaction to see your example inspire the officers and soldiers with the same sentiments. I caused an account to be sent me daily, of all the transactions of that siege, and always observed, that the ardour and patience of my troops increased, in proportion to the difficulties that arose, either from the swelling of the floods, the presence of the enemy, or the fire of the place. Every kind of success may be expected from so valiant a nation ; and I enjoin you to inform the general officers, and others, and even the whole army, that I am highly satisfied with them. You need not doubt my having the same sentiments with regard to you ; to assure you of which is the sole motive of this letter ; and, cousin, I beseech the Almighty to have you in his keeping, and direct you.

“ Versailles, July 23, 1734.”

I now return to the history. After Manlius had ended the speech repeated above, the army discovered, by their shouts, how impatiently they desired to be led against the enemy ; and, accordingly, the consul entered their territories. The Gauls did not once suspect that the Romans would invade them, as their country lay so remote from them ; and, therefore, were not prepared to oppose them. But, notwithstanding this, they made a long and vigorous resistance. They laid wait for Manlius in defiles ; disputed the passes with him ; shut themselves up in their strongest fortresses, and retired to such eminences as they thought inaccessible. However, the consul, so far from being discouraged, followed, and forced them wherever he came. He attacked them separately, stormed their cities, and defeated them in several engagements. I shall not descend to particulars, which were of little importance, and, consequently, would only tire the reader. The Gauls were obliged, at last, to submit, and to confine themselves within the limits prescribed them.

By this victory, the Romans delivered the whole country from the perpetual terrors it was under, from those barbarians, who hitherto had done nothing but harrass and plunder their neighbours. So happy a tranquillity was restored on this side, that the empire of the Romans was established there, from the river Halys to mount Taurus; and the kings of Syria were for ever excluded from all Asia Minor. ^m We are told, that Antiochusⁿ said, on this occasion, that he was highly obliged to the Romans, for having freed him from the cares and troubles, which the government of so vast an extent of country must necessarily have brought upon him.

^o Fulvius, one of the consuls, returned to Rome, in order to preside in the assembly. The consulate was given to M. Valerius Messala, and C. Livius Salinator. The instant the assembly broke up, Fulvius returned to his own province. Himself, and Manlius, his colleague, were continued in the command of the armies for a year, in quality of proconsuls.

Manlius had repaired to Ephesus, to settle, with the ten commissioners who had been appointed by the senate, the most important articles of their commission. The treaty of peace with Antiochus was confirmed, as also that which Manlius had concluded with the Gauls. Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, had been sentenced to pay the Romans six hundred talents, six hundred thousand crowns, for having assisted Antiochus; however, half this sum was accepted, at the request of Eumenes, who was to marry his daughter. Manlius made a present to Eumenes, of all the elephants which Antiochus, according to the treaty, had delivered up to the Romans. He repassed into Europe, with his forces, after having admitted the deputies of the several cities to audience, and settled the chief difficulties.

^m Cic. Orat. pro Dejot. n. xxxvi. Val. Max. l. iv. c. 1.

ⁿ Antiochus magnus; dicere est solitus, benigne sibi a populo Romano esse factum, quod nimis magna procuratione liberatus, modicis regni terminis uteretur. Cic.

^o A. M. 3816. Ant. J. C. 188. Liv. l. xxxviii. n. 35.

^P Antiochus was very much puzzled how to raise the sum he was to pay the Romans. He made a progress through the eastern provinces, in order to levy the tribute which they owed him; and left the regency of Syria, during his absence, to Seleucus, his son, whom he had declared his presumptive heir. Being arrived in the province of Elymais, he was informed, that there was a very considerable treasure in the temple of Jupiter Belus. This was a strong temptation to a prince, who had little regard for religion, and was in extreme want of money. Accordingly, upon a false pretence that the inhabitants of that province had rebelled against him, he entered the temple, in the dead of night, and carried off all the riches which had been kept there, very religiously, during a long series of years. However, the people, exasperated by this sacrilege, rebelled against him, and murdered him, with all his followers. ¹Aurelius Victor says, that he was killed by some of his own officers, whom he had beat, one day, when he was heated with liquor.

This prince was highly worthy of praise, for his humanity, clemency, and liberality. A decree, which we are told he enacted, whereby he gave his subjects permission, and even commanded them not to obey his ordinances, in case they should be found to interfere with the laws, shows that he had a high regard for justice. Till the age of fifty, he had behaved, on all occasions, with such bravery, prudence, and application, as had given success to all his enterprises, and acquired him the title of the Great. But, from that time, his wisdom, as well as application, had declined very much, and his affairs in proportion. His conduct in the war against the Romans; the little advantage he reaped by, or rather contempt for the wise counsels of Hannibal; the ignominious peace he was obliged to accept; these circumstances sullied the glory of his former successes; and his death, occasioned by a wicked and sacrilegious enterprise, threw an indelible blot upon his name and memory.

^P A. M. 3817. Ant. J. C. 187. Diod. in Excerpt. p. 298. Justin. l. xxxiii. c. 2. Hieron. in Dan. c. xi.

¹ De vitis illust. c. 54.

The prophecies of the eleventh chapter of Daniel, from the tenth to the nineteenth verse, relate to the actions of this prince, and were fully accomplished.

“But his sons,” of the king of the north, “shall be stirred up, and shall assemble a multitude of great forces; and one,” Antiochus the Great, “shall certainly come and overflow, and pass through; then shall he return, and be stirred up, even to his fortress.”

This king of the north was Seleucus Callinicus, who left behind him two sons, Seleucus Ceraunus, and Antiochus, afterwards surnamed the Great. The former reigned but three years, and was succeeded by Antiochus, his brother. The latter, after having pacified the troubles of his kingdom, made war against

¹ Ver. 10.

² See Ver. 8.

Ptolemy Philopator, king of the south, that is, of Egypt; dispossessed him of Celosyria, which was delivered to him by Theodotus, governor of that province; defeated Ptolemy's generals in the narrow passes near Berytus, and made himself master of part of Phenicia. Ptolemy then endeavoured to amuse him by overtures of peace. The Hebrew is still more expressive. "He," meaning Antiochus, "shall come. He shall overflow the" enemy's country. "He shall pass over" mount Libanus. "He shall halt," whilst overtures of peace are making him. "He shall advance with ardour as far as the fortresses," that is, to the frontiers of Egypt. Ptolemy's victory is clearly pointed out in the following verses.

"And the king of the south shall be moved with choler, and shall come forth and fight with him, even with the king of the north; and he shall set forth a great multitude, but the multitude shall be given into his hand." Ptolemy Philopator was an indolent, effeminate prince. It was necessary to excite and drag him, in a manner, out of his lethargy, in order to prevail with him to take up arms, and repulse the enemy, who were preparing to march into his country; provocatus. At last, he put himself at the head of his troops, and by the valor and good conduct of his generals, obtained a signal victory over Antiochus at Raphia.

"And when he hath taken away the multitude, his heart shall be lifted up, and he shall cast down many ten thousands; but he shall not be strengthened by ^rVer. 11.

ⁿVer. 12.

it." Antiochus lost upwards of ten thousand foot, and three hundred horse, and four thousand of his men were taken prisoners. Philopator, having marched, after his victory, to Jerusalem, was so audacious as to attempt to enter the sanctuary; "his heart shall be lifted up;" and being returned to his kingdom, he behaved with the utmost pride towards the Jews, and treated them very cruelly. He might have dispossessed Antiochus of his dominions, had he taken a proper advantage of his glorious victory; but, he contented himself with recovering Celosyria and Phenicia, and again plunged into his former excesses; "but he shall not be strengthened by it."

▼ "For the king of the north shall return, and shall set forth a multitude greater than the former, and shall certainly come, after certain years, with a great army, and with much riches." Antiochus, after he had ended the war beyond the Euphrates, raised a great army in those provinces. Finding, fourteen years after the conclusion of the first war, that Ptolemy Epiphanes, who was then but five or six years of age, had succeeded Philopator, his father; he united with Philip, king of Macedon, in order to deprive the infant king of his throne. Having defeated Scopas, at Panium, near the source of the river Jordan, he subjected the whole country which Philopator had conquered, by the victory he gained at Raphia.

▼ "And in those times there shall many stand up against the king of the south." This prophecy was fulfilled by the league made by the kings of Macedonia and Syria, against the infant monarch of Egypt;

by the conspiracy of Agathocles and Agathoclea for the regency ; and by that of Scopas, to dispossess him of his crown and life. * “ Also the robbers of thy people shall exalt themselves to establish the vision, but they shall fall.” Several apostate Jews, to ingratiate themselves with the king of Egypt, complied with every thing he required of them, even in opposition to the sacred ordinances of the law, by which means they were in great favour with him ; but it was not long lived ; for, when Antiochus regained possession of Judea and Jerusalem, he either extirpated, or drove out of the country, all the partisans of Ptolemy. This subjection of the Jews to the sovereignty of the kings of Syria, prepared the way for the accomplishment of the prophecy, which denounced the calamities that Antiochus Epiphanes, son of Antiochus the Great, was to bring upon this people ; which occasioned a great number of them to fall into apostacy.

† “ So the king of the north will come, and cast up a mount, and take the most fenced cities, and the arms of the south shall not withstand, neither his chosen people, neither shall there be any strength to withstand. † But he that cometh against him, shall do according to his own will, and none shall stand before him ; and he shall stand in the glorious land, which, by his hand, shall be consumed.” Antiochus, after having defeated the Egyptian army at Pancas, besieged and took, first Sidon, then Gaza, and afterwards all the cities of those provinces, notwithstanding the opposition made by the chosen troops which the king of Egypt had sent against him. "He did according to his own will," in Celysria and Palestine, and nothing was able to make the least resistance against him. Pursuing his conquests in Palestine, he entered Judea, "that glorious," or, according to the Hebrew, "that desirable land." He there established his authority, and strengthened it, by repulsing from the castle of Jerusalem the garrison which Scopas had thrown into it. This garrison being so well defended, that Antiochus was obliged to send for all his troops, in order to force it; and the siege continuing a long time, the country was ruined and "consumed" by the stay the army was obliged to make in it.

* The angel Gabriel here speaks to Daniel.

† Ver. 13.

† Ver. 16.

^a "He shall also set his face to enter with the strength of his whole kingdom, and upright ones with him. Thus shall he do, and he shall give him the daughter of women, corrupting her; but she shall not stand on his side, neither be for him." Antiochus, seeing that the Romans undertook the defence of young Ptolemy Epiphanes, thought it would best suit his interest to lull the king asleep, by giving him his daughter in marriage, in order to "corrupt her," and excite her to betray her husband. But he was not successful in his design; for, as soon as she was married to Ptolemy, she renounced her father's interest, and embraced those of her husband. It was on this account, that we see her ^b join with him in the embassy which was sent from Egypt to Rome, to congratulate the Romans on the victory which Acilius had gained over her father at Thermopylæ.

^a Ver. 17.

^b Legati ab Ptolemæo et Cleopatra, legibus Ægypti, gratulantes quod Manius Acilius consul Antiochum regem Græciæ expulisset, venerunt. Liv. l. xxxvii. n. 5.

^c “After this, shall he turn his face unto the isles, and shall take many. But a prince for his own behalf shall cause the reproach which Antiochus had offered him to cease ; without his own reproach he shall cause it to turn upon him.” Antiochus, having put an end to the war of Celosyria and Palestine, sent his two sons, at the head of the land army, to Sardis, while he himself embarked on board the fleet, and sailed to the Egean sea, where he took several islands, and extended his empire exceedingly on that side. However, “the prince” of the people, whom he had insulted by making this invasion, that is, L. Scipio, the Roman consul, “caused the reproach to turn upon him,” by defeating him at mount Sipilus, and repulsing him from every part of Asia Minor.

^d “Then shall he turn his face towards the fort of his own land ; but he shall stumble and fall, and not be found.” Antiochus, after his defeat, returned to Antioch, the capital of his kingdom, and the strongest fortress in it. He went soon after into the provinces of the east, in order to levy money to pay the Romans ; but, having plundered the temple of Elymais, he there lost his life in a miserable manner.

Such is the prophecy of Daniel, relating to Antiochus, which I have explained, in most places, according to the Hebrew text. I confess there may be some doubtful and obscure terms, which may be difficult to explain, and are variously interpreted by commentators ; but, is it possible for the substance of the prophecy to appear obscure and doubtful? Can any reasonable man, who makes use of his understanding, ascribe such a prediction, either to mere chance, or to the conjectures of human prudence and sagacity? Can any light, but which proceeds from God himself, penetrate, in this manner, into the darkness of futurity, and point out the events of it in so exact and circumstantial a manner? Not to mention what is here said concerning Egypt, Seleucus Callinicus, king of Syria, leaves two children behind him. The eldest reigns but three years, and does not perform any exploit worthy of being recorded; and, accordingly, the prophet does not take any notice of him. The youngest is Antiochus, surnamed the Great, from his great actions; and, accordingly, our prophet gives a transient account of the principal circumstances of his life, his most important enterprises, and even the manner of his death. In it, we see his expeditions into Celosyria and Phenicia, several cities of which are besieged and taken by that monarch; his entrance into Jerusalem, which is laid waste by the stay his troops make in it; his conquests of a great many islands; the marriage of his daughter with the king of Egypt, which does not answer the design he had in view; his overthrow by the Roman consul; his retreat to Antioch; and, lastly, his unfortunate end. These are, in a manner, the outlines of Antiochus's picture, which can be made to resemble none but himself. Is it to be supposed that the prophet drew those features without design, and at random, in the picture he has left us of him? The facts, which denote the accomplishment of the prophecy, are all told by heathen authors, who lived many centuries after the prophet in question, and whose fidelity cannot be suspected in any manner. We must renounce, not only religion, but reason, to refuse to acknowledge, in such prophecies as these, the intervention of a Supreme Being, to whom all ages are present, and who governs the world with absolute power.

SECTION IX.

SELEUCUS PHILOPATOR SUCCEEDS ANTIUCHUS. COMPLAINTS AGAINST PHILIP.

° ANTIUCHUS the Great dying, Seleucus Philopator, his eldest son, whom he had left in Antioch when he set out for the eastern provinces, succeeded him. But his reign was obscure and contemptible, occasioned by the misery to which the Romans had reduced that crown ; and the exorbitant sum, one thousand talents [£] annually, he was obliged to pay, during all his reign, by virtue of the treaty of peace concluded between the king his father, and that people.

§ Ptolemy Epiphanes, at that time, reigned in Egypt. Immediately, upon his accession to the throne, he had sent an ambassador into Achaia, to renew the alliance which the king his father had formerly concluded with the Achæans. The latter accepted of this offer with joy ; and, accordingly sent deputies to the king,

° A. M. 3817. Ant. J. C. 187. Appian. in Syr. p. 116.

£ About one hundred and ninety thousand pounds.

§ Polyb. in Leg. c. xxxvii.

Lycortas, father of Polybius the historian, and two other ambassadors. The alliance being renewed, Philopemen, who was at that time in office, inviting Ptolemy's ambassador to a banquet, they entered into discourse concerning that prince. In the praise the ambassador bestowed upon him, he expatiated very much on his dexterity in the chase, his address in riding, and his vigor and activity in the exercise of his arms; and, to give an example of what he asserted, he declared, that this prince, being on horseback, in a party of hunting, had killed a wild bull with the discharge of a single javelin.

The same year Antiochus died, Cleopatra, his daughter, queen of Egypt, had a son, who reigned after Epiphanes his father, and was called Ptolemy Philometer. ^h The whole realm expressed great joy upon the birth of this prince. Celosyria and Palestine distinguished themselves above all the provinces, and the most considerable persons of those countries, went to Alexandria upon that occasion, with the most splendid equipages. Josephus, of whom I have spoken elsewhere, who was receiver general of those provinces, being too old to take such a journey, sent his youngest son Hyrcanus, in his stead, who was a young man of abundance of wit, and very engaging manners. The king and queen gave him a very favourable reception, and did him the honour of a place at their table. A buffoon, who used to divert the king with his jests, said to him, "Do but behold, sir, the quantity of bones before Hyrcanus, and your majesty may judge in what a manner his father gnaws your provinces." Those words made the king laugh; and he asked Hyrcanus how he came to have so great a number of bones before him. "Your majesty need not wonder at that," replied he; "for dogs eat both flesh and bones, as you see the rest of the persons at your table have done," pointing to them; "but men are contented to eat the flesh, and leave the bones, like me." The mockers were mocked, by that retort, and continued mute and confused. When the day for making the presents arrived, as Hyrcanus had given out, that he had only five talents,ⁱ to present, it was expected that he would be very ill received by the king, and people diverted themselves with the thoughts of it beforehand. The greatest presents made by the rest did not exceed twenty talents.^k But Hyrcanus presented to the king an hundred boys, well shaped and finely dressed, whom he had bought, each of them bringing a talent as an offering; and to the queen as many girls in magnificent habits, each with a like present for that princess. The whole court was amazed at such uncommon and surpassing magnificence; and the king and queen dismissed Hyrcanus with the highest marks of their favour and esteem.

^h Joseph. Antiq. l. xii. c. 4.

¹ Ptolemy, in the first year of his reign, governed in so auspicious a manner, as gained him universal approbation and applause; because he followed, in all things, the advice of Aristomenes, who was another father to him; but, afterwards, the flattery of courtiers, ⁱ About seven hundred and fifty pounds.

^k About three thousand pounds.

that deadly poison to kings, prevailed over the wise counsels of that able minister. That prince shunned him, and began to give into all the vices and failings of his father. Not being able to endure the liberty which Aristomenes frequently took of advising him to act more consistently with himself, he dispatched him by poison. Having thus got rid of a troublesome censor, whose sight alone was importunate, from the tacit reproaches it seemed to make him, he abandoned himself entirely to his vicious inclinations; plunged into excesses and disorders of every kind; followed no other guides in the administration of affairs, but his wild passions; and treated his subjects with the cruelty of a tyrant.

The Egyptians, growing at last quite weary of the oppressions and injustice, to which they were daily exposed, began to cabal together, and to form associations against a king who oppressed them so grievously. Some persons of the highest quality, having engaged in this conspiracy, they had already formed designs for deposing him, and were upon the point of putting them in execution.

^m To extricate himself from the difficulties in which he was now involved, he chose Polycrates for his prime minister, a man of great bravery, as well as abilities, and who had the most consummate experience in affairs, both of peace and war; for he had risen to the command of the army under his father, and had served in that quality in the battle of Raphia, on which occasion he had contributed very much to the victory. He was afterwards governor of the island of Cyprus; and happening to be in Alexandria when Scopas's conspiracy was discovered, the expedients he employed on that occasion, conducted very much to the preservation of the state.

^m Polyb in Excerpt. p. 113.

▪ Ptolemy, by the assistance of this prime minister, overcame the rebels. He obliged their chiefs, who were the principal lords of the country, to capitulate and submit on certain conditions; but, having seized their persons, he forfeited his promise; and after having exercised various cruelties upon them, put them all to death. This perfidious conduct brought new troubles upon him, from which the abilities of Polycrates extricated him again.

The Achean league, at the time we are now speaking of, seems to have been very powerful, and in great consideration. We have seen that Ptolemy, a little after his accession to the throne, had been very solicitous to renew the ancient alliance with them. This, he was also very desirous of in the latter end of his reign; and, accordingly offered that republic six thousand shields, and two hundred talents of brass. His offer was accepted; and, in consequence of it, Lycortas and two other Achæans, were deputed to him, to thank him for the presents, and to renew the alliance; and these returned soon after with Ptolemy's ambassador, in order to ratify the treaty. ° King Eumenes also sent an embassy for the same purpose, and offered one hundred and twenty talents, about twenty one thousand pounds sterling, the interest of which to be applied for the support of the members of the public council. Others came likewise from

▪ A. M. 3821. Ant. J. C. 183.

° A. M. 3818. Ant. J. C. 186. Polyb. in Legat. c. 14. p. 850—852.

Seleucus, who, in the name of their sovereign, offered ten ships of war, completely equipped; and, at the same time, desired to have the ancient alliance with that prince renewed. The ambassador, whom Philopemen had sent to Rome, to justify his conduct, was returned from thence, and desired to give an account of his commission.

For these several reasons a great assembly was held. The first man that entered it, was Nicodemus of Elea. He gave an account of what he had said in the senate of Rome, with regard to the affair of Sparta, and the answer which had been made him. It was judged by the replies, that the senate, in reality, were not pleased with the subversion of the government of Sparta; with the demolition of the walls of that city, nor with the massacre of the Spartans; but, at the same time, that they did not annul any thing which had been enacted. And, as no person happened to speak for or against the answers of the senate, no further mention was made of it at that time. But the same affair will be the subject of much debate in the sequel.

The ambassadors of Eumenes were afterwards admitted to audience. After having renewed the alliance which had been formerly made with Attalus, that king's father; and, proposed, in Eumenes's name, the offer of an hundred and twenty talents; they expatiated largely on the great friendship and tender regard which their sovereign had always showed for the Acheans. When they had ended what they had to say, Apollonius, of Sicyon rose up, and observed, that the present which the king of Pergamus offered, considered in itself, was worthy of the Acheans; but, if regard was had to the end which Eumenes proposed to himself by it, and the advantage he hoped to reap by his munificence, in that case, the republic could not accept of this present, without bringing upon itself everlasting infamy, and being guilty of the greatest of prevarications. "For, in a word," continued he, "as the law forbids every individual, whether of the people or of the magistrates, to receive any gift from a king, upon any pretence whatsoever, the crime would be much greater, should the commonwealth, collectively, accept of Eumenes's offers. That, with regard to the infamy, it was self evident ; for," says Apollonius, "what could reflect greater ignominy in a council, than to receive, annually, from a king, money for its subsistence ; and, to assemble, in order to deliberate on public affairs, only as so many of his pensioners, and, in a manner, rising from his table, after having swallowed the bait ^p that concealed the hook ? But, what dreadful consequences might not be expected from such a custom, should it be established ? That afterwards Prusias, excited by the example of Eumenes, would also be liberal of his benefactions, and, after him, Seleucus ; that, as the interest of kings differed widely from those of republics ; and as, in the latter, their most important deliberations related to their differences with crowned heads, two things would inevitably happen ; either the Acheans would transact all things to the advantage of those princes, and to the prejudice of their own country ; or else they must behave with the blackest ingratitude towards their benefactors." He concluded his speech with exhorting the Acheans to refuse the present which was offered ; and added, " that it was their duty to take umbrage at Eumenes, for attempting to bribe their fidelity by such an offer." The whole assembly with shouts rejected unanimously the proposal of king Eumenes, however dazzling the offer of so large a sum of money might be.

^p Polybius, by this expression, would denote, that such a pension was a kind of bait that covered a hook ; that is, the design which Eumenes had of making all those, who composed the council, his dependants.

καταπαινωτατος οιορει δελταρ.

After this, Lycortas, and the rest of the ambassadors who had been sent to Ptolemy, were called in ; and the decree made by that prince, for renewing the alliance, was read. Aristenes, who presided in the assembly, having asked what treaty the king of Egypt desired to renew, several having been concluded with Ptolemy, upon very different conditions, and nobody being able to answer that question, the decision of that affair was referred to another time.

At last, the ambassadors of Seleucus were admitted to audience. The Acheans renewed the alliance which had been concluded with him ; but it was not judged expedient to accept, at that juncture, of the ships he offered.

^a Greece was far from enjoying a calm at this time ; and complaints were carried from all quarters, to Rome, against Philip. The senate thereupon nominated three commissioners, of whom Q. Cecilius was the chief, to go and take cognizance of those affairs upon the spot.

^r Philip still retained the strongest resentment against the Romans, with whom he believed he had just reason to be dissatisfied on many accounts ; but, particularly, because, by the articles of peace, he had not been allowed the liberty of taking vengeance on such of his subjects as had abandoned him, during the war. The Romans, however, had endeavoured to console him, by permitting him to invade Athamania, and Amynder, the king of that country ; by giving up to him some cities of Thessaly, which the Etolians had seized ; by leaving him the possession of Demetrias, and all Magnesia ; and, by not opposing him in his attempts upon Thrace ; all which circumstances had somewhat appeased his anger. He continually meditated, however, to take advantage of the repose which the peace afforded him, in order to prepare for war, whenever a proper opportunity should present itself. But the complaints that were made against him at Rome, having been listened to there, revived all his former disgusts.

^a A. M. 3819. Ant. J. C. 186.

^r Liv. l. xxxix. n. 23—29.

The three commissioners being arrived at Tempe, in Thessaly, an assembly was called there, to which came, on one side, the ambassadors of the Thessalians, of the Perrhebian, and Athamanians ; and, on the other, Philip, king of Macedon ; a circumstance that could not but greatly mortify the pride of so powerful a prince. The ambassadors explained their various complaints against Philip, with greater or less force, according to their different characters and abilities. Some, after excusing themselves for being obliged to plead against him, in favour of their liberty, entreated him to act in regard to them, rather as a friend than a master ; and, to imitate the Romans in that particular, who endeavoured to win over their allies, rather by friendship than fear. The rest of the ambassadors, being less reserved, and not so moderate, reproached him to his face, for his injustice, oppression, and usurpation ; assuring the commissioners, that in case they did not apply a speedy remedy, the triumphs they had obtained over Philip, and their restoration of the Grecians, inhabiting the countries near Macedonia, to their liberties, would all be rendered ineffectual ; that this prince,³ like a fiery courser, would never be kept in and restrained, without a very tight rein, and a sharp curb. Philip, that he might assume the air of an accuser, rather than of one accused, inveighed heavily against those who had harangued on this occasion, and particularly against the Thessalians. He said that, like slaves,⁴ who, being made free on a sudden, contrary to all expectation, break into the most injurious exclamations against their masters and benefactors ; so they abused, with the utmost insolence, the indulgence of the Romans ; and were incapable, after enduring a long servitude, to make a prudent and moderate use of the liberty which had been granted them. The commissioners, after hearing the accusations and answers, the circumstances of which I shall omit, as little important, and making some particular regulations, did not judge proper, at that time, to pronounce definitively upon their respective demands.

³ Ut equum sternacem non parentem, frenis asperioribus castigandum esse. Liv.

⁴ Insolenter et immodice abuti Thessalos, indulgentia populi Romani ; velut ex diutina siti nimis avidè meram haurientes libertatem. Ita, servorum modo præter spem repente manumissorum, licentiam vocis et linguæ experiri, et jactare sese insectatione et convicijs dominorum. Liv.

From thence they went to Thessalonica, to inquire into the affairs relating to the cities of Thrace ; and the king, who was very much disgusted, followed them thither. Eumenes's ambassadors said to the commissioners, that if the Romans were resolved to restore the cities of Enum and Maronea to their liberty, their sovereign was far from having a design to oppose it ; but that, if they did not concern themselves in regard to the condition of the cities which had been conquered from Antiochus ; in that case, the service which Eumenes, and Attalus his father, had done Rome, seemed to require, that they should rather be given up to their master than to Philip, who had no manner of right to them, but had usurped them by open force ; that, besides, these cities had been given to Eumenes, by a decree of the ten commissioners, whom the Romans had appointed to determine these differences. The Maronites, who were afterwards heard, inveighed in the strongest terms against the injustice and oppression which Philip's garrison exercised in their city.

Here Philip delivered himself in quite different terms from what he had done before ; and, directing himself personally to the Romans, declared, that he had long perceived they were fully determined never to do him justice on any occasion. He made a long enumeration of the grievous injuries he pretended to have received from them ; the services he had done the Romans on different occasions ; and, the zeal with which he had always adhered to their interest, so far as to refuse three thousand talents,^a fifty ships of war, completely equipped, and a great number of cities, which Antiochus offered him, upon condition that he would conclude an alliance with him. That, notwithstanding this, he had the mortification to see Eumenes preferred on all occasions, with whom it was too great a condescension to compare himself; and, that the Romans, so far from enlarging his dominions, as he thought his services merited, had even dispossessed him, as well of those cities to which he had a lawful claim, as of such as they had bestowed upon him. "You, O Romans," says he, concluding his speech, "are to consider upon what footing you intend to have me be with you. If you are determined to treat me as an enemy, and to urge me to extremities, in that case, you need only use me as you have hitherto done. But, if you still revere in my person, the title and quality of king, ally, and friend, spare me, I beseech you, the shame of being treated any longer with so much indignity."

The commissioners were moved with this speech of the king. For this reason, they thought it incumbent on them to leave the affair in suspense, by making no decisive answer; and, accordingly, they declared, that if the cities in question had been given to Eumenes, by the decree of the ten commissioners, as he pretended they were, in that case, it was not in their power to reverse it, in any manner; that, if Philip had acquired them by right of conquest, it was but just that he should be suffered to continue in possession of them; that, if neither of these things should be proved, then the cognizance of this affair should be left to the judgment of the senate ; and, in the mean time, the garrisons be drawn out of the cities, each party retaining its pretensions as before.

^a About four hundred and fifty thousand pounds sterling.

This regulation, by which Philip was commanded, provisionally, to withdraw his garrisons out of the respective cities, so far from satisfying that prince, so entirely discontented and enraged him, that the consequence would certainly have been an open war, if he had lived long enough to prepare for it.

▼ The commissioners, at their leaving Macedonia, went to Achaia. Aristenes, who was the chief magistrate, assembled immediately all the chiefs of the republic in Argos. Cecilius, coming into this council, after having applauded the zeal of the Achæans, and the wisdom of their government on all other occasions, added, that he could not forbear telling them, that their injurious treatment of the Lacedæmonians had been very much censured at Rome ; and, therefore, he exhorted them to amend, as much as lay in their power, what they had acted imprudently against them on that occasion. The silence of Aristenes, who did not reply a single word, showed that he was of the same opinion with Cecilius, and that they acted in concert. Diophanes of Megalopolis, a man better skilled in war than politics, and who hated Philopemen, without mentioning the affair of Sparta, made other complaints against him. Upon this, Philopemen, Lycortas, and Archon, began to speak with the utmost vigor, in defence of the republic. They showed, that the whole transaction at Sparta had been conducted by prudence, and even to the advantage of the Lacedemonians ; and that, had it been otherwise, human laws, as well as the reverence due to the gods, must have been violated. When Cecilius quitted the assembly, the members of it, moved with that discourse, came to a resolution, that nothing should be changed in what had been decreed, and that this answer should be made the Roman ambassador.

▼ Polyb. in Leg. c. xli. p. 853, 854.

When it was told Cecilius, he desired that the general assembly of the country might be convened. To this, the magistrates replied, that he must first produce a letter from the senate of Rome, by which the Achæans should be desired to meet. As Cecilius had no such letter, they told him plainly, that they would not assemble ; which exasperated him to such a degree, that he left Achaia, and would not hear what the magistrates had to say. It was believed that this ambassador, and before him, Marcus Fulvius, would not have delivered themselves with so much freedom, had they not been sure that Aristenes and Diophanes were in their interest ; and, indeed, they were accused of having invited those Romans into that country, purely out of hatred to Philopemen ; and, accordingly, were greatly suspected by the populace.

^w Cecilius, at his return to Rome, acquainted the senate with whatever had been transacted by him in Greece. After this, the ambassadors of Macedonia and Peloponnesus were brought in. Those of Philip and Eumenes were introduced first, and then the exiles of Ennum and Maronea ; who all repeated what they had before said, in the presence of Cecilius, in ^w A. M. 3820. Ant. J. C. 184. Polyb. in Leg. c. 42. Liv. l. xxxix. n. 33.

Thessalonica. The senate, after admitting them to audience, sent to Philip other ambassadors, of whom Appius Claudius was the principal, to examine, on the spot, whether he was withdrawn, as he had promised Cecilius, from the cities of Perrhebia ; to command him, at the same time, to evacuate Enum and Maronea ; and to draw off his troops from all the castles, territories, and cities, which he possessed on the seacoast of Thrace.

They next admitted to audience, Apollonidas, the ambassador whom the Acheans had sent, to give the reasons why they had not made their answers to Cecilius ; and, to inform the senate of all that had been transacted with regard to the Spartans, who had deputed to Rome, Areus and Alcibiades, who both were of the number of the first exiles whom Philopemen and the Acheans had restored to their country. The circumstance which most exasperated the Acheans was, to see, that notwithstanding the precious and recent obligation to their favour, they had, however, charged themselves with the odious commission of accusing those who had saved them so unexpectedly, and had procured them the invaluable blessing of returning to their houses and families. Apollonidas endeavoured to prove, that it would be impossible to settle the affairs of Sparta with greater prudence, than Philopemen and the rest of the Acheans had done ; and, they likewise cleared themselves, for their having refused to call a general assembly. On the other side, Areus and Alcibiades represented, in the most affecting manner, the sad calamity to which Sparta was reduced ; its walls were demolished ; its ^x citizens dragged into Achaia, and reduced to a state of captivity ; the sacred laws of Lycurgus, which had made it subsist during so long a series of years, and with so much glory, had been entirely abolished.

The senate, after weighing and comparing the reasons on both sides, ordered the same ambassadors to inquire into this affair, as were nominated to inspect those of Macedon ; and desired the Acheans to convene their general assembly, whenever the Roman ambassadors should require it ; as the senate admitted them to audience in Rome, as often as they asked it.

¶ When Philip was informed, by his ambassadors, who had been sent back to him from Rome, that he must absolutely evacuate all the cities of Thrace ; in the highest degree of rage, to see his dominions contracted on every side, he vented his fury on the inhabitants of Maronea. Onomastes, who was governor of Thrace, employed Cassander, who was very well known in the city, to execute the barbarous command of the prince. Accordingly, in the dead of night, they led a body of Thracians into it, who fell with the utmost violence on the citizens, and cut a great number of them to pieces. Philip, having thus wreaked his vengeance on those who were not of his faction, waited calmly for the commissioners, being firmly persuaded, that no one would dare to impeach him.

* By the decree of the Acheans, it had been enacted, that such slaves as had been adopted among the citizens of Sparta, should leave the city, and all Laconia ; in default of which, the Acheans were empowered to seize and sell them as slaves ; which had accordingly been executed.

¶ Polyb. in Leg. c. 44. Liv. l. xxxix. n. 34, 35.

Some time after, Appius arrives, who, upon being informed of the barbarous treatment which the Maronites had met with, reproached the king of Macedon, in the strongest terms, on that account. The latter resolutely asserted, that he had not been concerned, in any manner, in that massacre, but that it was wholly occasioned by an insurrection of the populace. "Some," says he, "declaring for Eumenes, and others for me, a great quarrel arose, and they butchered one another." He went so far, as to challenge them to produce any person, who pretended to have any articles to lay to his charge. But who would have dared to impeach him? His punishment had been immediate; and the aid he might have expected from the Romans, was too far off. "It is to no purpose," says Appius to him, "for you to apologize for yourself; I know what things have been done, as well as the authors of them." These words gave Philip the greatest anxiety. However, matters were not carried further at this first interview.

But Appius, the next day, commanded him to send immediately, Onomastes and Cassander to Rome, to be examined by the senate, on the affair in question; declaring, that there was no other way left for him to clear himself. Philip, upon receiving this order, changed colour, wavered within himself, and hesitated a long time before he made answer. At last, he declared that he would send Cassander, whom the commissioners suspected to be the contriver of the massacre; but he was determined not to send Onomastes, who, he declared, so far from having been in Maronea at the time this bloody tragedy happened, was not even in the neighbourhood of it. The true reason of this conduct was, Philip was afraid lest Onomastes, in whom he had reposed the utmost confidence, and had never concealed any thing from, should betray him to the senate. As for Cassander, the instant the commissioners had left Macedon, he put him on board a ship; but, at the same time, sent some persons after him, who poisoned him in Epirus.

After the departure of the commissioners, who were fully persuaded that Philip had contrived the massacre in Maronea, and was upon the point of breaking with the Romans; the king of Macedon reflecting in his own mind, and with his friends, that the hatred he bore the Romans, and the strong desire he had to wreak his vengeance on that people, must necessarily soon display itself; would have been very glad to take up arms immediately, and declare war against that people; but, not being prepared, he conceived an expedient to gain time. Philip resolved to send his son Demetrius to Rome, who, having been many years an hostage, and having acquired great esteem in that city, he judged very well qualified, either to defend him against the accusations with which he might be charged before the senate, or apologize for such faults as he really had committed.

He accordingly made all the preparations necessary for this embassy, and nominated several friends to attend the prince, his son, on that occasion.

He, at the same time, promised to succour the Byzantines; not that he was sincerely desirous of defending them, but only his bare advancing to aid that people, would strike terror into the petty princes of Thrace, in the neighbourhood of the Propontis, and would prevent their opposing the resolution he had formed of entering into war against the Romans. And accordingly he defeated those petty sovereigns in a battle, and took prisoner their chief, whereby he put it out of their power to annoy him, and returned into Macedon.

² The arrival of the Roman commissioners was expected in Peloponnesus, who were commanded to go from Macedon into Achaia. Lycortas, in order that an answer might be ready for them, summoned a council, in which the affair of the Lacedaemonians was examined. He represented to the assembly, such things as they might fear from them; the Romans seeming to favour their interest much more than that of the Achaeans. He expatiated chiefly on the ingratitude of Areus and Alcibiades, who, though they owed their return to the Achaeans, had however, been so base as to undertake the embassy against them to the senate, where they acted and spoke like professed enemies; as if the Achaeans had driven them from their country, when it was they who had restored them to it. Upon this, great shouts were heard in every part of the assembly, and the president was desired to bring the affair into immediate deliberation. Nothing prevailing but a passion and a thirst of revenge, Areus and Alcibiades were condemned to die.

The Roman commissioners arrived a few days after, and the council met at Clitor in Arcadia. This filled the Achaeans with the utmost terror; for, seeing Areus and Alcibiades, whom they had just before condemned to die, arrive with the commissioners, they naturally supposed, that the inquiry which was going to be made, would be no way favourable to them.

² Liv. l. xxxix. n. 35—37.

Appius then told them, that the senate had been strongly affected with the complaints of the Lacedemonians, and could not but disapprove of every thing which had been done on that occasion; the murder of those, who, on the promise which Philopemen had made them, had come to plead their cause; the demolition of the walls of Sparta; the abolition of the laws and institutions of Lycurgus, which had spread the fame of that city throughout the world, and made it flourish, for several ages.

Lycortas, as president of the council, and as having joined with Philopemen, the author of whatever had been transacted against Lacedemonia, undertook to answer Appius. He showed first, that as the Lacedemonians had attacked the exiles, contrary to the tenor of the treaty, which expressly forbid them to make any attempt against the maritime cities; these exiles, in the absence of the Romans, could have recourse only to the Achean league, which could not be justly accused, for having assisted them to the utmost of their power, in so urgent a necessity. That, with regard to the massacre which Appius laid to their charge, they ought not to be accused for it, but the exiles, who were then headed by Areus and Alcibiades; and who, by their own immediate impulse, and without being authorized in any manner by the Achæans, had fallen with the utmost fury and violence on those whom they supposed had been the authors of their banishment, and to whom the rest of the calamities they had suffered were owing. "However," added Lycortas, "it is pretended that we cannot but own, that we were the cause of the abolition of Lycurgus's laws, and the demolition of the walls of Sparta. This, indeed, is a real fact; but then, how can this double objection be made to us at the same time? The walls in question were not built by Lycurgus, but by tyrants, who erected them some few years ago, not for the security of the city, but for their own safety; and, to enable themselves to abolish, with impunity, the discipline and regulation so happily established by that wise legislator. Were it possible for him to rise now from the grave, he would be overjoyed to see those walls destroyed, and say, that he now knows and owns his native country and ancient Sparta. You should not, O citizens of Sparta, have waited for Philopemen or the Achæans; but ought, yourselves, to have pulled down those walls with your own hands, and destroyed even the slightest trace of tyranny. These were a kind of ignominious scars of your slavery; and, after having maintained your liberties and privileges, during almost eight hundred years, and been for some time the sovereigns of Greece, without the support and assistance of walls; they, within these hundred years, have become the instruments of your slavery, and, in a manner, your shackles and fetters. With respect to the ancient laws of Lycurgus, they were suppressed by the tyrants; and we have only substituted our own, by putting you upon a level with us in all things."

Addressing himself afterwards to Appius, "I cannot forbear owning," says he, "that the words I have hitherto spoken, were not as from one ally to another ; nor of a free nation, but as slaves who speak to their master. For, in fine, if the voice of the herald, who proclaimed us to be free, in the front of the Grecian states, was not a vain and empty ceremony ; if the treaty concluded at that time be real and solid ; if you are desirous of sincerely preserving an alliance and friendship with us ; on what can that infinite disparity, which you suppose to be between you Romans, and we Achæans, be grounded ? I do not inquire into the treatment which Capua met with, after you had taken that city ; why, then, do you examine into our usage of the Lacedæmonians, after we had conquered them ? Some of them were killed ; and I will suppose that it was by us. But, did you not strike off the heads of several Campanian senators ? We levelled the walls of Sparta with the ground ; but, as for you, Romans, you not only dispossessed the Campanians of their walls, but of their city and lands. To this, I know you will reply, that the equality expressed in the treaties between the Romans and Achæans, is merely specious, and a bare form of words ; that we really have but a precarious and derivative liberty ; but, that the Romans are possessed of authority and empire. This, Appias, I am but too sensible of. However, since we must be forced to submit to this, I entreat you, at least, how wide a difference soever you may set between yourselves and us, not to put your enemies and our own upon a level with us, who are your allies ; especially, not to show them better treatment. They require us, by forswearing ourselves, to dissolve and annul all we have enacted by oath ; and, to revoke that, which, by being written in our records, and engraved on marble, in order to preserve the remembrance of it eternally, is become a sacred monument, which it is not lawful for us to violate. We revere you, O Romans ; and, if you will have it so, we also fear you ; but then, we think it glorious to have a greater reverence and fear for the immortal gods.”

The greatest part of the assembly applauded this speech, and all were unanimous in their opinion, that he had spoken like a true magistrate ; it was, therefore, necessary for the Romans to act with vigor, or resolve to lose their authority. Appias, without descending to particulars, advised them, whilst they still enjoyed their freedom, and had not received any orders, to make a merit with regard to the Romans, of making that their own decree, which might afterwards be enjoined them. They were grieved at these words ; but were instructed by them, not to persist obstinately in the refusal of what should be demanded. All they therefore desired, was, that the Romans would decree whatever they pleased, with regard to Sparta ; but not oblige the Achæans to break their oath, by annulling their decree themselves. As to the sentence that was just before passed against Arcus and Alcibiades, it was immediately repealed.

* The Romans pronounced judgment the year following. The chief articles of the ordinance were, that those persons, who had been condemned by the Achæans, should be recalled and restored ; that all sentences relating to this affair should be repealed, and that Sparta should continue a member of the Achæan league.

* Liv. l. xxxi. n. 48.

^b Pausanias adds an article, not taken notice of by Livy ; that the walls, which had been demolished, should be rebuilt. Q. Marcius was appointed commissary, to settle the affairs of Macedon, and those of Peloponnesus, where great feuds and disturbances subsisted, especially, between the Achæans on one side, and the Messenians and Lacedæmonians on the other. ^c They all had sent ambassadors to Rome ; but, it does not appear that the senate was in any great haste to put an end to their differences. The answer they made to the Lacedæmonians was, that the Romans were determined not to trouble themselves any further about their affairs. The Achæans demanded aid of the Romans against the Messenians, pursuant to the treaty ; or, at least, not to suffer arms or provisions to be transported out of Italy, to the latter people. It was answered them, that when any cities broke their alliance with the Achæans, the senate did not think itself obliged to enter into those disputes ; for, that this would open a door to ruptures and divisions, and even, in some measure, give a sanction to them.

In these proceedings appears the artful and jealous policy of the Romans ; which tended solely to weaken Philip, and the Achæans, of whose power they were jealous ; and who covered their ambitious designs, with the specious pretence of succouring the weak and oppressed.

^b In Achaic. p. 414.

^c Polyb. in Leg. c. 51.

SECTION X.

PHILOPEMEN BESIEGES MESSENE. HE IS TAKEN PRISONER, AND PUT TO DEATH. PTOLEMY EPIPHANES DIES.

^d DINOCRATES, the Messenian, who had a particular enmity to Philopemen, had drawn off Messene from the Achean league, and was meditating how he might best seize upon a considerable post, called Corone, near that city. Philopemen, then seventy years of age, and generalissimo of the Achæans for the eighth time, lay sick. However, the instant the news of this was brought him, he set out, notwithstanding his indisposition; made a countermarch, and advanced towards Messene, with a small body of forces, consisting of the flower of the Megalopolitan youth. Dinocrates, who had marched out against him, was soon put to flight; but, five hundred troopers, who guarded the open country of Messene, happening to come up and reinforce him, he faced about, and routed Philopemen. This general, who was solicitous of nothing but to save the gallant youths, who had followed him in this expedition, performed the most extraordinary acts of bravery; but, happening to fall from his horse, and receiving a deep wound in his head, he was taken prisoner by the enemy, who carried him to Messene. Plutarch considers this ill fortune of Philopemen, as the punishment for some rash and arrogant words, that had escaped him, upon his hearing a certain general applauded. "Ought that man," says he, "to be valued, who suffers himself to be taken alive by the enemy, whilst he has arms to defend himself?"

^d A. M. 3821. Ant. J. C. 183. Liv. l. xxxix. n. 48. Plut. in Philop. p. 366—368. Polyb. in Leg. c. 52, 53:

Upon the arrival of the first news which was carried to Messene, viz. that Philopemen was taken prisoner, and on his way to that city, the Messenians were in such transports of joy, that they all ran to the gates of the city; not being able to persuade themselves of the truth of what they heard, till they saw him themselves, so greatly improbable did this relation appear to them. To satisfy the violent curiosity of the inhabitants, many of whom had not yet been able to get a sight of him, they were forced to show the illustrious prisoner on the theatre, where multitudes came to see him. When they beheld Philopemen dragged along in chains, most of the spectators were so much moved with compassion, that the tears trickled from their eyes. There even was heard a murmur among the people, which resulted from humanity, and a very laudable gratitude; "That the Messenians ought to call to mind the great services done by Philopemen, and his preserving the liberty of Achaia, by the defeat of Nabis the tyrant." But the magistrates did not suffer him to be long exhibited in this manner, lest the pity of the people should be attended with ill consequences. They therefore took him away on a sudden; and, after consulting together, caused him to be conveyed to a place, called the treasury. This was a subterraneous place, whither neither light nor air entered from without, and had no door to it; but was shut with a huge stone, that was rolled over the entrance of it. In this dungeon they imprisoned Philopemen, and posted a guard round every part of it.

As soon as it was night, and all the people were withdrawn, Dinocrates caused the stone to be rolled away, and the executioner to descend into the dungeon, with a dose of poison, to Philopemen, commanding him not to stir till he had swallowed it. The moment the illustrious Megalopolitan perceived the first glimmerings of light, and saw the man advance towards him, with a lamp in one hand, and a sword in the other, he raised himself with the utmost difficulty, for he was very weak, sat down, and then taking the cup, he inquired of the executioner, whether he could tell what was become of the young Megalopolitans, his followers, particularly Lycortas? The executioner answering, that he heard almost all of them had saved themselves by flight; Philopemen thanked him by a nod; and, looking kindly on him, "You bring me," says he, "good news; and I find we are not entirely unfortunate;" after which, without breathing the least complaint, he swallowed the deadly dose, and laid himself again on his cloak. The poison was very speedy in its effects; for, Philopemen being extremely weak and feeble, he expired in a moment.

When the news of his death spread among the Achæans, all their cities were inexpressibly afflicted and dejected. Immediately, all their young men, who were of age to bear arms, and all their magistrates, came to Megalopolis. Here a grand council being summoned, it was unanimously resolved not to delay a moment the revenge of so horrid a deed; and, accordingly, having elected on the spot, Lycortas for their general, they advanced, with the utmost fury into Messene, and filled every part of it with blood and slaughter. The Messenians, having now no refuge left, and being unable to defend themselves by force of arms, sent a deputation to the Achæans, to desire that an end might be put to the war, and to beg pardon for their past faults. Lycortas, moved at their entreaties, did not think it advisable to treat them as their furious and insolent revolt seemed to deserve. He told them, that there was no other way for them to expect a peace, but by delivering up the authors of the revolt, and of the death of Philopemen; to submit all their affairs to the disposal of the Achæans, and to receive a garrison into their citadel. These conditions were accepted, and executed immediately. Dinocrates, to prevent the ignominy of dying by an executioner, laid violent hands on himself, in which he was imitated by all those, who had advised the putting Philopemen to death. Lycortas caused those to be delivered up, who had advised the insulting of Philopemen. These were, undoubtedly, the persons who were stoned round his tomb, as we shall soon see.

The funeral obsequies of Philopemen were then solemnized. After the body had been consumed by the flames, his ashes laid together, and deposited in an urn, the train set out for Megalopolis. This procession did not so much resemble a funeral, as a triumph; or, rather, it was a mixture of both. First came the infantry, their brows adorned with crowns, and all shedding floods of tears. Then followed the Messenian prisoners, bound in chains; afterwards the general's son, young Polybius,^e carrying the urn, adorned with ribands and crowns, and accompanied by the noblest and most distinguished Achæans. The urn was followed by all the cavalry, whose arms glittered magnificently, and whose horses were all richly caparisoned, who closed the march, and did not seem too much dejected at this mournful scene, nor too much elate from their victory. All the inhabitants of the neighbouring towns and villages, flocked to meet the procession, as if they came in honour of a victory obtained. All possible honours were done to Philopemen at his interment, and the Messenian captives were stoned round his sepulchre. The cities in general, by decrees enacted for that purpose, ordered all the greatest honours to be paid him, and erected many statues to him, with magnificent inscriptions.

^e This was Polybius the historian, who might then be about twenty two.

Several years after,^f at the time that Corinth was burned and destroyed by Mummius, the proconsul, a false accuser, a Roman, as I observed elsewhere, used his utmost endeavours to get them broke to pieces; prosecuted him criminally, as if alive; charging him with having been an enemy to the Romans, and of discovering a hatred for them on all occasions. The cause was heard in council, before Mummius. The slanderer exhibited all his articles of impeachment, and expatiated on them. They were answered by Polybius, who refuted them with great solidity and eloquence. It is great pity so affecting a piece should have been lost. Neither Mummius, nor his council, would permit the monuments of that great man's glory to be destroyed, though he had opposed, like a bulwark, the successes of the Romans; for, the Romans of that age, says

^f Thirty seven years.

Plutarch, made the just and proper disparity between virtue and interest ; they distinguished the glorious and honest, from the profitable ; and, were persuaded, that worthy persons ought to honour and revere the memory of men, who signalized themselves by their virtue, though they had been their enemies.

Livy tells us, that the Greek, as well as Roman writers observe, that three illustrious men, Philopemen, Hannibal, and Scipio, happened to die in the same year, or thereabouts ; thus putting Philopemen in parallel, and, as it were, upon a level, with the two most celebrated generals of the two most powerful nations in the world. I believe I have already given the reader a sufficient idea of his character, so shall only repeat what I before observed, that Philopemen was called the last of the Greeks, as Brutus was said to be the last of the Romans.

The Messenians, by their imprudent conduct, being reduced to the most deplorable condition, were, by the goodness and generosity of Lycortas and the Achæans, restored to the league from which they had withdrawn themselves. Several other cities, which, from the example they set them, had also renounced it, renewed their alliance with it. Such commonly is the happy effect which a seasonable act of clemency produces ; whereas, a violent and excessive severity, that breathes nothing but blood and vengeance, often hurries people to despair, and so far from proving a remedy to evils, only inflames and exasperates them the more.

When news came to Rome, that the Achæans had happily terminated their war with the Messenians, the ambassadors were addressed in terms quite different from those which had been used to them before. The senate told them, that they had been particularly careful not to suffer either arms or provisions to be carried from Italy to Messene; an answer which manifestly discovers the insincerity of the Romans, and the little regard they had to faith, in their transactions with other nations. They seemed, at first, desirous of giving the signal to all the cities engaged in the Achean league, to take up arms; and, now they endeavored to flatter the Acheans into an opinion that they had sought all opportunities to serve them.

It is manifest, on this occasion, that the Roman senate consented to what had been transacted, because it was not in their power to oppose it; that they wanted to make a merit of this, with regard to the Acheans, who possessed almost the whole force of Peloponnesus; that they were very cautious of giving the least umbrage to this league, at a time when they could not depend in any manner on Philip; when the Etolians were disgusted; and, when Antiochus, by joining with that people, might engage in some enterprise which might have been of ill consequence to the Romans.

§ I have related Hannibal's death in the history of the Carthaginians. After his retiring from Antiochus's court, he fled to Prusias, king of Bithynia, who was then at war with Eumenes, king of Pergamus. Hannibal did that prince great service. Both sides prepared for a naval engagement, on which occasion, Eumenes's fleet consisted of a much greater number of ships than that of Prusias. But Hannibal opposed stratagem to force. He had got together a great number of venomous serpents, and filled several earthen vessels with them. The instant the signal for battle was given, he commanded the officers and sailors to fall upon Eumenes's galley only, informing them, at the same time, of a sign by which they should distinguish it from the rest; and to annoy the enemy no otherwise than by throwing the earthen vessels into the rest of the galleys. At first, this was only laughed at; the sailors not imagining that these earthen vessels could be of the least service. But, when the serpents were seen gliding over every part of the galleys, the soldiers and rowers, now studious only of preserving themselves from those venomous creatures, did not once think of the enemy. In the mean time, the royal galley was so warmly attacked, that it was very near being taken; and it was with the utmost difficulty that the king made his escape. Prusias, by Hannibal's assistance, gained several victories by land. This prince being one day afraid to venture a battle, because the victims had not been propitious; "What,"^b says Hannibal, "do you rely more upon the liver of a beast than upon the counsel of Hannibal?" To prevent his falling into the hands of the Romans, who required Prusias to deliver him up, he took a dose of poison, which brought him to his end.

§ Liv. l. xxxix. n. 51. Cor. Nep. in Annib. c. 10—12. Justin. l. xxxii. c. 4.

ⁱ I before observed, that the Romans, among many other articles, had decreed, that Sparta should be admitted into the Achean league. The ambassadors being returned, and having reported the answer which had been received from the senate, Lycortas assembled the people at Sicyon, to deliberate whether Sparta should be admitted into the Achean league. To incline the populace to it, he represented, that the Romans, to whose disposal that city had been abandoned, would no longer be burthened with it; that, they had declared to the ambassadors, that they were no ways concerned in this affair; that the Spartans, in the administration of the public affairs, were very desirous of that union, which, he observed, could not fail of being attended with great advantage to the Achean league, as the first exiles, who had behaved with great ingratitude and impiety towards them, would not be included in it, but would be banished from the city, and other citizens substituted in their room. But Diophanes, and some other persons, undertook to defend the cause of the exiles. However, notwithstanding their opposition, the council decreed, that Sparta should be admitted into the league, and was so accordingly. With regard to the first exiles, those only were pardoned, who could not be convicted of engaging in any attempt against the Achean republic.

^b An tu, inquit, vitulinæ carunculæ, quam imperatori veteri mavis credere? Unius hostiæ jecinori longo experimento testatam gloriam suam postponi, æquo animo non tulit. Val. Max. l. iii. c. 7.

ⁱ A. M. 3822. Ant. J. C. 182. Polyb. in Leg. c. 53.

When the affair was ended, ambassadors were sent to Rome, in the name of all the parties concerned. The senate, after giving audience to those sent by Sparta, and by the exiles, said nothing to the ambassadors, which tended to show that they were disgusted, in any manner, at what had passed. With respect to those who had been lately sent into banishment, the senate promised to write to the Achæans, to obtain leave for them to return into their native country. Some days after, Bippus, the Achæan deputy, being arrived in Rome, was introduced into the senate; and there gave an account of the manner in which the Messenians had been restored to their former state; and the senators were not only satisfied with every thing he related to them, but treated him with abundant marks of honour and amity.

^k The Lacedæmonian exiles were no sooner returned from Rome into Peloponnesus, but they delivered to the Achæans the letters which the senate had sent by them, and by which they were desired to permit the exiles to settle again in their native country. It was answered, that the purport of those letters should be considered at the return of the Achæan ambassadors from Rome. Bippus arrived from thence a few days after, and declared, that the senate had written in favour of the exiles, not so much out of affection for them, as to get rid of their importunities. The Achæans, hearing this, thought it requisite not to make any change in what had been decreed.

^l Hyperbates, having been reelected general of the Achæans, again debated in the council, whether any notice should be taken of the letters which the senate had written, concerning the reestablishment of the exiles, who had been banished from Sparta. Lycortas was of opinion, that the Achæans ought to adhere to what had been decreed. "When the Romans," says he, "listen favourably to such complaints and entreaties of unfortunate persons, as appear to them just and reasonable, they, in this, act a very just part. But, when it is represented to them, that among the favours which are requested at their hands, some are not in their power to bestow, and others would reflect dishonour, and be very prejudicial to their allies; on these occasions they do not use to persist obstinately in their opinions, or exact, from such allies, an implicit obedience to their commands. This is exactly our case at present. Let us inform the Romans, that we cannot obey their orders, without infringing the sacred oaths we have taken; without violating the laws on which our league is founded; and then, they will undoubtedly wave their resolutions, and confess, that it is with the greatest reason we refuse to obey their commands." Hyperbates, and Callicrates were of a contrary opinion. They were for having implicit obedience paid to the Romans; and declared, that all laws, oaths, and treaties, ought to be sacrificed to their will. In this contrariety of opinions, it was resolved, that a deputation should be sent to the senate, in order to represent the reasons given by Lycortas, in council. Callicrates, Lysiades, and Aratus, were the ambassadors to whom instructions were given, in conformity to what had been deliberated.

^k A. M. 3823. Ant. J. C. 181. Polyb. in Leg. c. 54.

^l A. M. 3824. Ant. J. C. 180. Polyb. in Leg. c. 58.

When these ambassadors were arrived at Rome, Callicrates, being introduced into the senate, acted in direct opposition to his instructions. He not only had the assurance to censure those who differed in opinion from him, but took the liberty to tell the senate what they should do. "If the Greeks," says he, directing himself to the senators, "do not obey you; if they pay no regard either to the letters or orders which you send them, you must blame yourselves only for it. In all the states of Greece there are now two parties; one of which, asserts that all your orders ought to be obeyed; and, that laws and treaties, in a word, that all things should pay homage to your will and pleasure. The other party pretends, that it is fitting, that laws, treaties, and oaths, ought to take place of your will; and are for ever exhorting the people to adhere inviolably to them. Of these two parties, the last suits best with the genius and character of the Achæans, and has the greatest influence over the people. What is the consequence of this? Those who comply with your measures are detested by the common people, whilst such as oppose your decrees are honoured and applauded. Whereas, if the senate would show ever so little favour to such as espouse their interest cordially, the chief magistrates and officers of all the republics would declare for the Romans; and the people, intimidated by this, would soon follow their example. But, whilst you show an indifference on this head, all the chiefs will certainly oppose you, as the infallible means of acquiring the love and respect of the people. And, accordingly, we see, that many people, whose only merit consists in their making the strongest opposition to your orders, and a pretended zeal for the defence and preservation of the laws of their country, have been raised to the most exalted employments in their country. In case you do not much value whether the Greeks are, or are not, at your devotion, then indeed your present conduct suits exactly your sentiments. But, if you would have them execute your orders, and receive your letters with respect, reflect seriously on this matter; otherwise, be assured, that they will, on all occasions, declare against your commands. You may judge of the truth of this from their present behaviour towards you. How long is it since you commanded them, by your letters, to recal the Lacedæmonian exiles? Nevertheless, so far from recalling them, they have published a quite contrary decree, and have bound themselves by oath, never to reinstate them. This ought to be a lesson to you, and show how cautious you should be for the future."

Callicrates, after making this speech, withdrew. The exiles then came in, told their business in few words, but in such as were well adapted to move compassion, and then retired.

A speech so well calculated to favour the interest of Rome, as that of Callicrates, could not but be very agreeable to the senate. In this did the Greeks begin to throw themselves spontaneously into the arms of slavery; prostituted the liberty, of which their ancestors had been so exceedingly jealous, and paid a submission and homage to the Romans, which they had always refused to the great king of Persia. Some flatterers and ambitious traitors, regardless of every thing but their interest, sold and sacrificed the independence and glory of Greece for ever; discovered the weak side of republics, with regard to their domestic affairs; pointed out the methods by which they might be weakened, and at last crushed; and furnished themselves the chains in which they were to be bound.

In consequence of this speech, it was soon concluded, that it would be proper to increase the power and credit of those who made it their business to defend the authority of the Romans, and to humble such as should presume to oppose it. Polybius observes, that this was the first time that the fatal resolution was taken, to humble and depress those, who, in their respective countries, had the most noble way of thinking; and, on the contrary, to heap riches and honours on all such, who, whether right or wrong, should declare in favour of the Romans; a resolution, which soon after increased the herd of flatterers in all republics, and very much lessened the number of the true friends of liberty. From this period, the Romans made it one of the constant maxims of their policy, to oppress by all possible methods, whoever ventured to oppose their ambitious projects. This single maxim may serve as a key to the latent principles and motives of the government of this republic, and to show us what idea we ought to entertain of the pretended equity and moderation they sometimes display, but which does not long support itself, and of which a just judgment cannot be formed, but by the consequences.

To conclude, the senate, in order to get the exiles restored to their country, did not only write to the Achæans, but to the Etolians, Epirots, Athenians, Beotians, and Acarnanians, as if they intended to incense all Greece against the Achæans; and, in their answer to the ambassadors, they did not make the least mention of any one but Callicrates, whose example the senate wished the magistrates of all other cities would follow.

That deputy, after receiving this answer, returned in triumph, without reflecting that he was the cause of all the calamities, which Greece, and particularly Achaia, were upon the point of experiencing. For, hitherto, a sort of equality had been observed between the Achæans and Romans, which the latter thought fit to permit, out of gratitude for the considerable services the Achæans had done them ; and, for the inviolable fidelity with which they had adhered to them, in the most perilous junctures, as in the wars against Philip and Antiochus. The members of this league distinguished themselves, at that time, in a most conspicuous manner, by their authority, their forces, their zeal for liberty ; and, above all, by the shining merit and exalted reputation of their commanders. But Callicrates's treason, for we may justly bestow that name upon it, gave it a deadly wound. The Romans, says Polybius, noble in their sentiments, and full of humanity, are moved at the complaints of the wretched, and think it their duty to afford their aid to all who fly to them for protection ; and, this it was, that inclined them to favour the cause of the Lacedæmonian exiles. But, if any one, on whose fidelity they may safely depend, suggests to them the inconveniences they would bring upon themselves, should they grant certain favours ; they generally return to a just way of thinking, and correct, so far as lies in their power, what they may have done amiss. Here, on the contrary, Callicrates studies nothing, but how he may best work upon their passions by flattery. He had been sent to Rome, to plead the cause of the Achæans ; and, by a criminal and unparalleled prevarication, he declares against his superiors, and becomes the advocate of their enemies, by whom he had suffered himself to be corrupted. At his return to Achaia, he spread so artfully the terror of the Roman name, and intimidated the people to such a degree, that he got himself elected captain general. He was no sooner invested with this command, but he restored the exiles of Lacedæmonia and Messene to their country.

Polybius, on this occasion, praises exceedingly the humanity of the Romans, the tenderness with which they listen to the complaints of the unfortunate, and their readiness to atone for such unjust actions as they may have committed, when they are once made acquainted with them. I know not whether the applauses he gives them will not admit of great abridgment. The reader must call to mind, that he wrote this in Rome, and under the eye of the Romans, after Greece had been reduced to a state of slavery. We are not to expect from an historian, who is subject and dependent, so much veracity, as he very possibly would have observed in a free state, and at a time when men were permitted to speak the truth ; and, we must not blindly believe every circumstance of this kind, advanced by him ; facts have more force, and speak in a clearer manner than he does. The Romans themselves did not scruple to commit injustice, whenever they had an opportunity of employing a foreign means for that purpose ; which procured them the same advantage, and served to conceal their unjust policy.

^m Eumenes, in the mean time, was engaged in war against Pharnaces, king of Pontus. The latter took Sinope, a very strong city of Pontus, of which his successors remained possessors ever afterwards. Several cities made complaints against this at Rome. Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, who was united in interest with Eumenes, sent also ambassadors thither. The Romans several times employed their mediation and authority, to put an end to their differences ; but, Pharnaces was insincere on these occasions, and always broke his engagements. Contrary to the faith of treaties, he took the field, and was opposed by the confederate kings. Several enterprises ensued ; and, after some years had been spent in this manner, a peace was concluded.

ⁿ Never were more embassies sent, than at the time we are now speaking of. Ambassadors were seen in all places, either coming from the provinces to Rome, or going from Rome to the provinces ; or, from the allies and nations to one another. ^o The Achæans deputed, in this quality, to Ptolemy Epiphanes, king of Egypt, Lycortas, Polybius his son, and the young Aratus, to return that monarch thanks for the presents he had already bestowed on their republic, and the new offers he had made them. However, these ambassadors did not leave Achaia ; because, when they were preparing to set out, advice came that Ptolemy was dead.

^p This prince, after having overcome the rebels within his kingdom, as has been already mentioned,

^m A. M. 3822 Ant. J. C. 182. Polyb. in Leg. c. 51—53—55—59.

ⁿ A. M. 3824. Ant. J. C. 180. ^o Polyb in Leg. c. 57.

^p A. M. 3824. Ant. J. C. 180. Hieron. in Daniel.

résolved to attack Seleucus, king of Syria. When he began to form the plan for carrying on this war, one of his principal officers asked, by what methods he would raise money for the execution of it. He replied, that his friends were his treasure. The principal courtiers concluded, from this answer, that, as he considered their purses as the only fund he had to carry on this war, they were upon the point of being ruined by it. To prevent, therefore, that consequence, which had more weight with them than the allegiance they owed their sovereign, they caused him to be poisoned. This monarch was thus despatched, in his twenty ninth year, after he had sat twenty four years on the throne. Ptolemy Philometor, his son, who was but six years of age, succeeded him ; and, Cleopatra, his mother, was declared regent.

CHAPTER II.

THIS second chapter includes the space of twenty years, from the year of the world 3821, till 3840. In this interval are contained ; the first twenty years of Ptolemy Philometor's reign over Egypt, which amounted, in the whole, to thirty four years ; the five last years of Philip, who reigned forty years in Macedonia, and was succeeded by Perseus, who reigned eleven ; the eight or nine last years of Seleucus Philopator, in Syria ; and, the eleven years of Antiochus Epiphanes, his successor, who exercised the most horrid cruelties against the Jews. I shall reserve the eleven years of Perseus's reign over Macedonia, for the following book, though they coincide with part of the history related in this chapter.

SECTION I.

PERSEUS CONSPIRES AGAINST DEMETRIUS. THE LATTER IS INNOCENTLY PUT TO DEATH, AND PERSEUS SUCCEEDS TO THE THRONE.

^a FROM the spreading of a report among the states contiguous to Macedonia, that such as went to Rome, to complain against Philip, were heard there, and many of them very favourably; a great number of cities, and even private persons, made their complaints in that city against a prince, who was a very troublesome neighbour to them all, with the hopes, either of having the injuries redressed, which they pretended to have received; or, at least, to console themselves, in some measure for them, by being allowed the liberty to deplore them. King Eumenes, among the rest, to whom, by order of the Roman commissioners and senate, the fortresses in Thrace were to be given up, sent ambassadors, at whose head was Atheneus, his brother, to inform the senate, that Philip did not evacuate the garrisons in Thrace, as he had promised; and, to complain of his sending succours into Bithynia, to Prusias, who was then at war with Eumenes.

Demetrius, the son of Philip, king of Macedon, was, at that time, in Rome; whither, as has been already mentioned, he had been sent by his father, in order to superintend his affairs in that city. It was properly his business to answer the several accusations brought against his father ; but, the senate, imagining that this would be a very difficult task for so young a prince, who was not accustomed to speak in public ; to spare him that trouble, they sent certain persons to him, to inquire, whether the king, his father, had not given him some memorials, and contented themselves with his reading them. Philip therein justified himself to the best of his power, with respect to most of the articles which were exhibited against him ; but he especially showed great disgust at the decrees which the Roman commissioners had enacted against him, and at the treatment he had met with from them. The senate saw plainly what all this tended to ; and, as the young prince endeavoured to apologize for certain particulars, and assured them, that every thing should be done agreeably to the will of the Romans, the senate replied, that his father Philip could not have done more wisely, or what was more agreeable to them, than in sending his son Demetrius to make his excuses. That, as to past transactions, the senate might dissemble, forget, and bear with a great many things ; that, as to the future, they relied on the promise which Demetrius gave ; that, although he was going to leave Rome, in order to return to Macedon, he left there, as the hostage of his inclinations, his own good heart and attachment for Rome, which he might retain inviolably, without infringing, in any manner, the duty he owed his father ; that, out of regard to him, ambassadors should be sent to Macedon, to rectify, peaceably, and without noise, whatever might have been hitherto amiss ; and that, as to the rest, the senate was well pleased to let Philip know, that he was obliged to his son Demetrius for the tenderness with which the Romans behaved towards him. These marks of distinction, which the senate gave him, with the view of exalting his credit in his father's court, only animated envy against him ; and, at length, occasioned his destruction.

^a A. M. 3821. Ant. J. C. 183. Liv. l. xxxix. n. 46, 47.

^b The return of Demetrius to Macedon, and the arrival of the ambassadors, produced different effects, according to the various dispositions of men's minds. The people, who extremely feared the consequences of a rupture with the Romans, and the war that was preparing, were highly pleased with Demetrius, from the hopes that he would be the mediator and author of a peace ; not to mention, that they considered him as the successor to the throne of Macedon, after the demise of his father. For, though he was the younger son, he had one great advantage of his brother, and that was, his being born of a mother, who was Philip's lawful wife ; whereas, Perseus was the son of a concubine, and even reputed supposititious. Besides, it was not doubted but that the Romans would place Demetrius on his father's throne, Perseus not having any credit with them. And these were the common reports.

On one side, also, Perseus was greatly uneasy ; as he feared, that the advantage of being elder brother would be but a very feeble title against a brother superior to him in all other respects ; and, on the other, Philip, imagining that it would not be in his power to dispose of the throne as he pleased, beheld, with a jealous eye, and dreaded the two great authority of his younger son. It was, also, a great mortification to him, to see rising, in his life time, and before his eyes, a kind of second court, in the concourse of Macedonians, who crowded about Demetrius. The young prince himself, did not take sufficient care to prevent or sooth the growing disaffection to his person. Instead of endeavouring to suppress envy, by gentleness, modesty, and complacency, he only inflamed it, by a certain air of haughtiness, which he had brought with him from Rome, valuing himself upon the marks of distinction, with which he had been honoured in that city; and not scrupling to declare, that the senate had granted him many things they had refused his father.

^b Liv. l. xxxix. n. 53.

Philip's discontent was much more inflamed at the arrival of the new ambassadors, to whom his son made his court more assiduously than to himself; and, when he found he should be obliged to abandon Thrace, to withdraw his garrisons from that country, and to execute other things, either pursuant to the decrees of the first commissioners, or to the fresh orders he had received from Rome. All these orders and decrees he complied with, very much against his will, and with the highest secret resentment; but which he was forced to obey, to prevent his being involved in a war, for which he was not sufficiently prepared. To remove all suspicion of his harbouring the least design that way, he carried his arms into the very heart of Thrace, against people, with whom the Romans did not concern themselves in any manner.

° However, his schemes were not unknown at Rome. Marcius, one of the commissioners, who had communicated the orders of the senate to Philip, wrote to Rome, to inform them, that all the king's discourses, and the several steps he took, visibly threatened an approaching war. To make himself the more secure of the maritime cities, he forced all the inhabitants, with their families, to leave them; settled them in^d the most northern part of Macedon, and substituted, in their places, Thracians, and other barbarous nations, whom he believed would be more faithful to him. These changes occasioned a general murmur in every part of Macedon; and all the provinces echoed with the cries and complaints of poor, unhappy people, who were forced away out of their houses, and the places where they were born, to be confined in unknown countries. Nothing was heard, on all sides, but imprecations and curses against the king, who was the author of these innovations.

° But, Philip, so far from being moved at their grief, grew more cruel from it. All things were suspected by him, and gave him umbrage. He had put to death a great number of persons, upon suspicion that they favoured the Romans. He thought his own life could not be safe, but in securing their children; and he imprisoned them, under a good guard, in order to have them all destroyed, one after another. Nothing could be more horrid in itself, than such a design; but, the sad catastrophe of one of the most powerful and most illustrious families in Thessaly, made it still more execrable.

° Liv. l. xl. n. 3—5.

^d Emathia, formerly called Peonia.

He had put to death, many years before, Herodicus, one of the principal persons of the country; and, some time after, his two sons in law. Theoxena and Archo, his two daughters, had lived widows, each of them having a son, both very young. Theoxena, who was sought for in marriage by the richest and most powerful noblemen in Thessaly, preferred widowhood to the nuptial state; but Archo married a nobleman of Enia, called Poris, and brought him several children, whom Archo, dying early, left infants. Theoxena, that she might have an opportunity of bringing up her sister's children under her eye, married Poris; took the same care of them as she did of her own son; and, was as tender of them as if she had been their mother. When news was brought her of Philip's cruel edict, to murder the children of those who had been put to death; plainly foreseeing, that they would be given up to the brutal fury of the king and his officers, she formed a surprising resolution, declaring that she would imbrue her hands in the blood of all her children, rather than suffer them to fall into the merciless power of Philip. Poris, whose soul was struck with horror at this design, told her, in order to divert her from it, that he would send all their children to Athens, to some friends, on whose fidelity and humanity he could safely rely; and, that he himself would convey them thither. Accordingly, they all set out from Thessalonica, in order to sail to the city of Enia, to assist at a solemn festival, which was solemnized annually, in honour of Eneas, their founder.

Having spent the whole day in festivity and rejoicing, about midnight, when every body else was asleep, they embarked on board a galley, which Poris had prepared for them, as if intending to return to Thesalonica, but, in reality, to go for Eubea ; when, unhappily, a contrary wind prevented them from advancing forwards, in spite of their utmost efforts, and drove them back towards the coast. At daybreak, the king's officers, who were posted to guard the port, having perceived them, immediately sent off an armed sloop ; commanding the captain of it, upon the severest penalties, not to return without the galley. As it drew nearer, Poris was seen every moment, either exhorting the ship's company, in the strongest terms, to exert themselves to the utmost, in order to get forward ; or, lifting up his hands to heaven, and imploring the assistance of the gods. In the mean time, Theoxena, resuming her former resolution, and presenting to her children the deadly dose she had prepared, and the daggers she had brought with her ; " Death," says she, " only can free you from your miseries ; and here is what will procure you that last, sad refuge. Secure yourselves from the king's horrid cruelty, by the method you like best. Go, my dear children, such of you as are most advanced in years, and take these poinards ; or, in case a slower kind of death may be more grateful, take this poison." The enemy were now almost in reach, and the mother was very urgent with them. They obeyed her fatal commands ; and all, having either swallowed the deadly draughts, or plunged the daggers in their bosoms, were thrown into the sea. Theoxena, after giving her husband a last sad embrace, leaped into the sea with him. Philip's officers then seized the galley, but did not find one person alive in it.

The horror of this tragical event revived and inflamed, to a prodigious degree, the hatred against Philip. He was publicly detested as a bloody tyrant; and people vented, in all places, both against him and his children, dreadful imprecations, which, says Livy, soon had their effect; the gods having abandoned him to a blind fury, which prompted him to wreak his vengeance against his own children.

^f Perseus saw, with infinite pain and affliction, that the regard of the Macedonians for his brother Demetrius, and his credit and authority among the Romans increased daily. Having now no hopes left, of being able to ascend the throne but by criminal methods, he made them his only refuge. He began, by sounding the disposition of those who were in greatest favour with the king, and by addressing them in obscure and ambiguous words. At first, some seemed not to enter into his views, and rejected his proposals, from believing that there was more to be hoped from Demetrius. But afterwards, observing, that the hatred of Philip for the Romans increased sensibly; which Perseus endeavoured daily to inflame, and which Demetrius, on the contrary, opposed to the utmost, they changed their opinion. Judging naturally, that the latter, whose youth and inexperience made him not sufficiently upon his guard against the artifices of his brother, would at last fall a victim to them; they thought it their interest to promote an event which would happen without their participation, and to go over immediately to the strongest party. They accordingly did so, and devoted themselves entirely to Perseus.

^f Liv. l. xl. n. 5—16.

Having postponed the execution of their more remote designs, they were of opinion, that for the present it would be proper for them to employ their utmost efforts to exasperate the king against the Romans, and to inspire him with thoughts of war, to which he was already very much inclined. At the same time, to render Demetrius every day more suspected, they industriously, on all occasions, made the discourse turn in the king's presence upon the Romans; some expressing the utmost contempt for their laws and customs, others for their exploits; some for the city of Rome, which, according to them, was void of ornaments and magnificent buildings; and others, even for such of the Romans as were in highest estimation; making them all pass in this manner in a kind of review. Demetrius, who did not perceive the scope and tendency of all these discourses, never failed, out of zeal for the Romans, and by way of contradiction to his brother, to take fire on these occasions. Hence Demetrius, without considering the consequences, grew suspected and odious to the king, and opened the way for the accusations and calumnies preparing against him. Accordingly, his father did not communicate to him any of the designs he continually meditated against Rome, and unbosomed himself only to Perseus.

The ambassadors whom he had sent to the Bastarnæ, to desire aid from them, returned about the time we are now speaking of. These had brought with them several youths of quality, and even princes of the blood, one of whom promised his sister in marriage to one of Philip's sons. This new alliance with a powerful nation, very much exalted the king's courage. Perseus, taking advantage of this opportunity; "Of what use," says he, "can all this be to us? We have not so much to hope from foreign aids, as to dread from domestic foes. We harbour in our bosoms, I will not say a traitor, but, at least, a spy. The Romans, ever since he was an hostage among them, have restored us his body; but, as to his heart and inclinations, those he has left with them. Almost all the Macedonians fix already their eyes on him; and, are persuaded, that they shall never have any king, but him whom the Romans shall please to set over them." By such speeches, the old king's disgust was perpetually kept up, who was already but too much alienated from Demetrius.

About this time the army was reviewed, in a festival solemnized every year with religious pomp, the ceremonies whereof were as follow. A bitch, says Livy, is divided into two parts; [§] it being cut, long ways, through the middle of the body, after which half is laid on each side of the road. The troops under arms are made to march through the two parts of the victim thus divided. At the head of this march, the shining arms of all the kings of Macedon are carried, tracing them backwards to the most remote antiquity. The king, with the princes, his children, appear afterward, followed by all the royal household, and the companies of guards. The march is closed by the multitude of the Macedonians. On the present occasion, the two princes walked on each side of the king; Perseus, being thirty years of age, and Demetrius twenty five; the one in the vigor, the other in the flower of his age; sons, who might have formed their father's happiness, had his mind been rightly disposed and reasonable.

[§] We find, in scripture, the like ceremony, in which, in order for the concluding of a treaty, the two contracting parties pass through the parts of the victim divided. Jer. xxxiv. 18.

The custom was, after the sacrifices which accompanied this ceremony were over, to exhibit a kind of tournament, and to divide the army into two bodies, who fought with no other arms but files, and represented a battle. The two bodies of men were commanded by the two young princes. However, this was not a mere mock battle; all the men exerting themselves, with their blunted weapons, with as much ardour as if they had been disputing for the throne. Several were wounded on both sides, and nothing but swords were wanting to make it a real battle. The body commanded by Demetrius had very much the superiority. This advantage gave great unbrage to Perseus. His friends, on the contrary, rejoiced at it, judging that this would be a very favourable and natural opportunity for him to form an accusation against his brother.

The two princes, on that day, gave a grand entertainment to the soldiers of their respective parties. Perseus, whom his brother had invited to his banquet, refused to come. The joy was very great on both sides, and the guests drank in proportion. During the entertainment, much discourse passed about the battle ; and, the guests intermixed their speeches with jests and satirical flings, some of which were very sharp, against those of the contrary party, without sparing even the leaders. Perseus had sent a spy to observe all that should be said at his brother's banquet ; but, four young persons, who came by accident out of the hall, having discovered this spy, gave him very rude treatment. Demetrius, who had not heard of what happened, said to the company ; " Let us go and conclude our feast at my brother's, to soften his pain, if he has any remaining, by an agreeable surprise, which will show that we act with frankness and sincerity ; and do not harbour any malice against him." Immediately, all cried that they would go, those excepted, who were afraid that their ill treatment of the spy would be revenged. But, Demetrius forcing them thither also, they concealed swords under their robes, in order to defend themselves, in case there should be occasion. When discord reigns in families, it is impossible for any thing to be kept secret in them. A man, running hastily before, went to Perseus, and told him that Demetrius was coming, and had four men, well armed, in his train. He might easily have guessed the cause of it, as he knew that they were the persons who had abused his spy. Nevertheless, to make this action still more criminal, Perseus orders the door to be locked ; and then, from the window of an upper apartment, which looked into the street, cried aloud to his servants not to open the door to wretches, who were come with design to assassinate them. Demetrius, who was a little warm with wine, after having complained, in a loud and angry tone of voice, at being refused admittance, returned back, and again sat down to table ; still ignorant of the affair relating to Perseus's spy.

The next day, as soon as Perseus could get an opportunity to approach his father, he entered his apartment with a very dejected air ; and continued some time in his presence, but at a little distance, without opening his mouth. Philip, being greatly surprised at his silence, asked what could be the cause of the concern which appeared in his countenance ? “ It is the greatest happiness for me,” answers Perseus, “ and by the merest good fortune in the world, that you see me here alive. My brother now no longer lays secret snares for me ; he came in the night to my house, at the head of a body of armed men, purposely to assassinate me. I had no other way left to secure myself from his fury, but by shutting my doors, and keeping the wall between him and me.” Perseus perceiving, by his father's countenance, that he was struck with astonishment and dread ; “ If you will condescend,” says he, “ to listen a moment to me, you shall be fully acquainted with the whole state of the affair.” Philip answered, that he would willingly hear him ; and immediately ordered Demetrius to be sent for. At the same time, he sent for Lysimachus, and Onomastes, to ask their advice on this occasion. These two men, who were his intimate friends, were far advanced in years. They had not concerned themselves with the quarrel of the two princes, and appeared very seldom at court. Philip, whilst he waited for their coming, walked several times up and down his apartment alone ; during which, he revolved a variety of thoughts, his son Perseus standing all the time at a distance. When word was brought Philip, that his two venerable friends were come, he withdrew to an inner apartment with them, and as many of his life guards ; and permitted each of his sons to bring three persons, unarmed, along with him ; and, having taken his seat, he spoke to them as follows.

“ Behold in me an unhappy father, forced to sit as judge between my two sons, one the accuser, and the other charged with the horrid guilt of fratricide ; reduced to the sad necessity of finding, in one of them, either a criminal or a false accuser. From certain rumours, which long since reached my ears, and an unusual behaviour I observed between you, a behaviour no way suiting brothers, I indeed was afraid this storm would break over my head ; and yet, I hoped, from time to time, that your discontents and disgusts would soften, and your suspicions vanish away. I recollected that contending kings and princes, laying down their arms, had frequently contracted alliances and friendships ; and, that private men had suppressed their animosities. I flattered myself, that you would one day remember the endearing name of brethren, by which you are united ; those tender years of infancy, which you spent in simplicity and union ; in fine, the counsels so often repeated by a father ; counsels, which, alas ! I am afraid have been given to children deaf and indocile to my voice. How many times, after setting before you examples of the discord between brothers, have I represented its fatal consequences, by showing you, that they had thereby involved themselves in inevitable ruin ; and, not only themselves, but their children, families, and kingdoms ? On the other side, I proposed good examples for your imitation ; the strict union between the two kings of Lacedæmonia, so advantageous during several centuries, to themselves and their country ; in opposition to division and private interest, that changed the monarchic government into tyranny, and proved the destruction of Sparta. By what other method, than by fraternal concord, did the two brothers, Eumenes and Attalus, from such weak beginnings, as almost reflected dishonour on the regal dignity, rise to a pitch of power, equal to mine, to that of Antiochus, and of all the kings we know of ? I even did not scruple to cite examples from the Romans, of which I myself had either been an eye witness, or heard from others ; as the two brothers, Titus and Lucius Quintius, who both were engaged in war with me ; the two Scipios, Publius and Lucius, who defeated and subjected Antiochus ; their father and their uncle, who, having been inseparable during their lives, were undivided in death. Neither the crimes of the one, though attended with such fatal consequences ; nor the virtues of the other, though crowned with such happy success, have been able to make you abhor division and discord, and to inspire you with gentle and pacific sentiments. Both of you, in my life time, have turned your eyes and guilty desires upon my throne. You will not suffer me to live, till, surviving one of you, I secure my crown to the other, by my death. The fond names of father and brother are insupportable to both. Your souls are strangers to tenderness and love. A restless desire of reigning has banished all other sentiments from your breasts, and entirely engrosses you. But come, let me hear what each of you have to say. Pollute the ears of your parent with real or feigned accusations. Open your criminal mouths; vent all your reciprocal slanders, and afterwards, arm your parricide hands one against the other. I am ready to hear all you have to say; firmly determined to shut my ears eternally, from henceforth, against the secret whispers and accusations of brother against brother." Philip, having spoken these last words with great emotion, and an angry tone of voice, all who were present wept, and continued a long time in a mournful silence.

At last, Perseus spoke as follows. "I perceive plainly, that I ought to have opened my door in the dead of night; to have admitted the assassins into my house, and presented my throat to their murderous swords, since guilt is never believed, till it has been perpetrated; and, since I, who was so inhumanly attacked, receive the same injurious reproaches as the aggressor. People have but too much reason to say, that you consider Demetrius only as your true son; whilst unhappy I, am looked upon as a stranger, sprung from a concubine, or even an impostor. For, did your breast glow with the tenderness which a father ought to have for his child, you would not think it just to inveigh so bitterly against me, for whose life so many snares have been laid, but against him who contrived them; and you would not think my life so inconsiderable, as to be entirely unmoved at the imminent danger I escaped; nor, to that to which I shall be exposed, should the guilt of my enemies be suffered to go unpunished. If I must die without being suffered to breathe my complaints, be it so ; let me leave the world in silence, and be contented with beseeching the gods, in my expiring moments, that the crime, which was begun in my person, may end in it, and not extend to your sacred life. But, if, what nature inspires in those, who, seeing themselves attacked unawares in solitude, implore the assistance even of strangers to them, I may be allowed to do with regard to you on the present occasion. If, when I see swords drawn round me, in order to pierce my heart, I may be permitted to vent forth a plaintive and supplicating voice ; I conjure you, by the tender, the dear name of father, for which, whether my brother or I have had the greatest reverence, you yourself have long known, to listen to me at this time, as if, awaked suddenly from your sleep, by the tumult of what passed last night, chance had brought you, at the instant of my danger, and in the midst of my complaints ; and, that you had found Demetrius at my door, attended by persons in arms. What I should have told you yesterday, in the greatest emotion, and seized with fear, I say to you now.

“ Brother, it is long since we have not behaved towards one another, like persons desirous of sharing in parties of pleasure. You are fired with an insatiable thirst of reigning ; but, you find an invincible obstacle in my age, the law of nations, the ancient customs of Macedonia ; and, a still stronger circumstance, my father’s will and pleasure. It will be impossible for you ever to force these barriers, and to ascend the throne, but by imbruing your hands in my blood. To compass your horrid ends, you employ instruments of all kinds, and set every engine at work. Hitherto, my vigilance, or my good fortune, have preserved me from your bloody hands. Yesterday, at the review, and the ceremony of the tournament which followed it, the battle, by your contrivance, became almost bloody and fatal ; and, had I not suffered myself and my followers to be defeated, you would have sent me to the grave. From this fight, indeed of enemies, you insidiously wanted, as if what had passed had been only the diversion of brothers, to allure me to your feast. Can you suppose, royal father, that I should have met with unarmed guests there, as those very guests came to my palace, completely armed, at so late an hour ? Can you imagine, that, favoured by the gloom, they would not have strove to plunge their daggers in my heart ; as the same persons, in open day, and before your eyes, almost killed me with their wooden weapons ? How ! You, who are my professed enemy ; you, who are conscious that I have so much reason to complain of your conduct ; you, I say, come to me in the night, at an unseasonable hour, and at the head of a company of armed young men ? I did not think it safe for me to go to your entertainment ; and, should I receive you in my house at a time, when, heated with the fumes of wine, you came so well attended ? Had I then opened my door, royal sir, you would be preparing to solemnize my funeral, at this very instant, in which you vouchsafe to hear my complaints. I do not advance any thing dubious, nor speak barely from conjecture. For, can Demetrius deny, but that he came to my house, attended by a band of young people, and that some of them were armed ; I only desire to have those, whom I shall name, sent for. I believe them capable of any thing ; but yet, they cannot have the assurance to deny the fact. Had I brought them before you, after seizing them armed in my house, you would be fully convinced of their guilt ; and, surely, their own confession ought to be a no less proof of it.

“ You call down imprecations and curses upon impious sons, who aspire to your throne ; this, august sir, you have great reason to do. But, then, I beseech you not to vent your imprecations blindly, and at random. Distinguish between the innocent and the guilty. Let him, who meditated the barbarous design of murdering his brother, feel the dire effects of the anger of the gods, the avengers of paternal authority ; but then, let him, who, by his brother’s guilt, was brought to the brink of destruction, find a secure asylum in his father’s tenderness and justice. For, where else can I expect to find one. I, to whom neither the ceremony of the review, the solemnity of the tournament, my own house, the festival, nor the hours of night, allotted by the gods to the repose of man, could afford the least security ? If I go to the entertainment to which my brother invites me, I am a dead man ; and, it will be equally fatal to me, if I admit him into my house, when he comes thither at midnight. Snares are laid for me, wherever I tread. Death lies in ambush for me, wherever I move. To what place, then, can I fly for security ?

“ I have devoted myself only to the gods, and to you, my royal father. I never made my court to the Romans, and cannot have recourse to them. There is nothing they more earnestly wish, than my ruin, because I am so much affected with their injustice to you ; because I am tortured to the soul, and fired with indignation, to see you dispossessed of so many cities and dominions ; and, lately, of the maritime coasts of Thrace. They cannot flatter themselves with the hopes of ever making themselves masters of Macedonia, as long as you or I am in being. They are sensible, that, should I die by my brother's guilt, or age bring you to the grave ; or, they not wait the due course of nature ; that then, the king and kingdom will be at their disposal.

“Had the Romans left you the possession of some city or territory, not in the kingdom of Macedon, I possibly might have had some opportunity of retiring to it. But, will it be answered, I shall find a sufficiently powerful protection in the Macedonians ? You yourself, royal father, saw with what animosity and virulence the soldiers attacked me in the battle. What was wanting, for my destruction, but swords of steel ? However, the arms they wanted, my brother's guests assumed in the night. What shall I say of a great part of the principal persons of your court, who ground all their hopes on the Romans, and on him who is all powerful with them ? They are not ashamed to prefer him, not only to me, who am his elder brother ; but, I might almost say it, to you, who are our king and father. For, they pretend, it is to him you are obliged for the senate's remitting you some of those things which they otherwise would have required. It is he who now checks the Romans, and prevents their advancing, in a hostile manner, into your kingdom. In fine, if they may be believed, your old age has no other refuge, but the protection which your young son procures you. On his side are the Romans, on all the cities which have been dismembered from your dominions, as well as all such Macedonians, whose dependence, with regard to fortune, lies wholly in the Romans. But, with respect to myself, I look upon it as glorious to have no other protector but my royal father, and to place all my hopes in him alone.

“What do you judge to be the aim and design of the letter you lately received from Quintius, in which he declares expressly, that you acted prudently for your interest, in sending Demetrius to Rome ; and, wherein he exhorts you to send him back thither, accompanied by other ambassadors, and a greater train of Macedonian noblemen ? Quintius is now every thing with Demetrius. He has no other guide but his counsels, or rather his orders. Quite forgetting that you are his father, he seems to have substituted him in your place. It is in the city of Rome, and in his sight, he formed the secret and clandestine designs, which will soon break out into action. It is merely to have the better opportunity of putting them in execution, that Quintius orders you to send along with Demetrius a greater number of the Macedonian nobility. They set out from this country, with the most sincere attachment to your person and interest ; but, won by the gracious treatment they meet with in that city, they return from it, entirely corrupted and debauched by different sentiments. Demetrius is all in all with them ; they even presume, in your life time, to give him the title of king. If I appear shocked at this conduct, I have the grief to see, not only others, but yourself, my royal father, charge me with the horrid design of aspiring to your throne. Should this accusation be levelled at us both, I am conscious of my own innocence ; and, it cannot, in any manner, affect me. For who, in that case, should I dispossess, to seize upon what would be another's right. There is no one but my father between me and the throne ; and I beseech the gods that he may long continue so. In case I should happen to survive him, and this I would not wish, but so long as he should desire it, I shall succeed him in the kingdom, if it be his good pleasure. He may be accused of aspiring to the throne, and of aspiring, in the most unjust and criminal manner, who is impatient to break the order and bounds prescribed by age, by nature, by the usages and customs of Macedonia, and by the law of nations. My elder brother, says Demetrius to himself, to whom the kingdom belongs, both by right of seniority, and my father's will, is an obstacle to my ambitious views. What, then, must be done ? I must despatch him. I shall not be the first who has waded through a brother's blood to the throne. My father in years, and without support, will be too much afraid for his own life, to meditate revenge for his son's death. The Romans will be greatly pleased to see me on the throne ; they will approve my conduct, and be able to support me. I own, most gracious father, these projects may all be defeated ; but, I am sure they are not without foundation. In a word, I reduce all to this ; it is in your power to secure my life, by bringing to condign punishment, those who yesterday armed to assassinate me ; but, should their guilt take effect, it will not be in your power to revenge my death.”

As soon as Perseus had ended his speech, all the company cast their eyes on Demetrius, to intimate, that it was incumbent on him to answer immediately. But that young prince, being quite oppressed with sorrow, shedding floods of tears, and seeming unable to speak, a long silence ensued. At last, being pressed to answer, he made his grief give way to necessity, and spoke as follows.

“ Perseus, royal sir, by accusing me in your presence, and by shedding fictitious tears to move you to compassion, has made you suspect mine, which, alas ! are but too sincere ; and, by that means, deprived me of all the advantages the accused generally have. Ever since my return from Rome, he has been day and night laying snares for me, in secret cabals with his creatures ; and yet, he represents me to you, not only as laying hidden ambuscades to destroy him, but attacking him by open force, and persons in arms. He endeavours to alarm you by the pretended dangers which surround him, in hopes that you will put to death his innocent brother. He declares that he has no refuge, no asylum left, with design to prevent my finding one in your clemency and justice. In the solitary and abandoned state to which I see myself reduced, quite friendless and unprotected, he strives to make me odious, by reproaching me with a foreign credit and support, which are rather a prejudice than a service to me.

“ Observe, I beseech you, with what insidious art he has blended and confounded the transactions of last night, with every other circumstance of my life ; and, this in a double view, first to raise a suspicion in you of my conduct in general, from this last action, the innocence of which will soon be evident ; and, secondly, to support, by this idle story of a nocturnal attack, his equally idle accusation, of my harbouring criminal views, hopes, and pretensions. At the same time, he has endeavoured to show, that this accusation was not premeditated or prepared ; but, that it was wholly the effect of the fear with which he was seized, occasioned by last nights tumult. But, Perseus, if I had attempted to betray my father and his kingdom ; had I engaged in conspiracies with the Romans, and with the enemies of the state, you ought not to have waited for the opportunity of the fictitious story of last nights transaction, but, should have impeached me, before this time, of such treason. If the charge of treason, when separated from the other, was altogether improbable, and could serve to no other purpose, but to prove how much you envy me, and not to evidence my guilt ; you ought not to have mentioned it now, but should have postponed that charge to another time ; and, have examined now this question only, whether you laid snares for me, or I for you. I, nevertheless, will endeavour, as far as the confusion, into which this sudden and unforeseen accusation has thrown me, will permit, to separate and distinguish what you have thrown together indiscriminately ; and, to show whether you or myself ought, in justice, to be accused of dealing treacherously last night.

“ Perseus asserts, that I harboured a design to assassinate him, in order that, by the death of my elder brother, to whom the crown appertains, by the right of nations, by the customs of Macedonia, and even, as he pretends, by your determination ; I, though the younger son, might succeed to the throne. To what purpose, therefore, is that other part of his speech, where he declares, that I have been particularly studious to ingratiate myself with the Romans, and flattered myself with the hopes of being able to ascend the throne by their assistance ? For, if I thought the Romans were powerful enough to bestow the kingdom of Macedon on whomsoever they pleased ; and, if I relied so much on my credit and authority with them, why should I commit a fratricide, of no advantage to myself ? What ! should I have affected to surround my temples with a diadem, dyed with my brother’s blood, merely that I might become odious and execrable, even to those with whom I had acquired some authority, admitting I have some credit with them, by a probity either real or dissembled ? Unless you can suppose that Quintius, whose counsel I am accused of following ; he, I say, who lives in so delightful an union with his brother, suggested to me the horrid design of imbruing my hands in my brother’s blood. Perseus has summed up all the advantages, by which, as he would insinuate, I can promise myself a superiority over him, such, as the credit of the Romans, the suffrages of the Macedonians, and the almost universal consent of gods and men ; and yet he, at the same time, as if I was inferior to him in all respects, charges me with having recourse to an expedient which none but the blackest villains could employ. Will you, gracious sir, have us judged upon this principle and rule, that whichever of us two was apprehensive that the other would be judged more worthy of the diadem, shall be declared to have formed the design of murdering his brother ?

“ But, let us come to facts, and examine the order and plan of the criminal enterprise, with which I am charged. Perseus pretends to have been attacked in different manners, all which are, however, included within the space of one day. I attempted, as he says, to murder him in broad day light, in the battle which followed the sacred ceremony of the review. I had determined to poison him at an entertainment to which I had invited him ; in fine, I resolved to attack him with open force, in the dead of night, attended by armed persons, to a party of pleasure, at his house.

“ You see, sir, the season I had chosen to commit this fratricide ; a tournament, a banquet, a party of pleasure. How venerable and solemn was this day ! a day on which the army is reviewed, on which the resplendent arms of all the Macedonian monarchs are carried in the front of the procession ; on which it passes through the two parts of the sacred victim ; and on which, we have the honour to march with you, at the head of the whole Macedonian people. What ! though purified, by this august sacrifice, from all the faults I might before have committed ; having before my eyes, the sacred victim through which we passed, was my mind intent upon fratricides, poisons, and daggers ! Defiled in such a manner, by crimes of the most horrid nature, by what ceremonies, by what victims, would it have been possible for me to purify myself ?

“ It is evident, that my brother, hurried on by a blind passion, to calumniate and destroy me, in his endeavour to make every thing suspected, and a crime in me, betrays and contradicts himself. For, brother, had I formed the abominable design of poisoning you at my table, what could be more ill judged than to exasperate you, and to put you upon your guard by an obstinate battle, in which I should have discovered that I had designs of violence against you ; and, by that means, have prevented your coming to an entertainment to which I had invited you, and at which you, accordingly, refused to be present ? But, surely, after such a refusal, should I not have endeavoured to reconcile myself to you ; and, as I had resolved to take you off by poison, ought I not to have sought another opportunity for giving you the fatal draught ? Was it natural for me to change suddenly, in one day, my barbarous design, and to attempt to assassinate you, upon pretence of going to your house on a party of pleasure ? Could I reasonably flatter myself with the hopes, taking it for granted that the fear of your being murdered had made you refuse to come to my entertainment, that the same fear would not induce you to refuse me admittance into your house ?

“ I presume, sir, I may confess to you, without blushing, that in a day of festivity and rejoicing, happening to be in company with some people of the same age with myself, I drank more plentifully than usual. Inquire, I beseech you, how we spent our time at the feast, how full of mirth we were, how transported with thoughtless gaiety, very much heightened by our, perhaps, too indiscreet joy, for the victory we had gained in the tournament. It is the sad condition of an unforeseen accusation ; it is the danger in which I now see myself involved, that have dispelled but too easily the fumes of wine ; otherwise, a calm assassin, my eyes had still been closed in slumbers. Had I formed a resolution to attack your house, with the view of murdering you, would it not have been possible for me to abstain, for one day, from immoderate drinking, and to keep my companions from the like excess ?

“ But, that it may not be thought that I, only, act with frankness and simplicity, let us hear my brother, whose conduct is sincere and undisguised, and who does not harbour the least suspicion. All, says he, that I know, and the only thing I have to complain of, is, that they came armed to my house, upon pretence of engaging in a party of pleasure. Should I ask you how you came to know this, you will be forced to own, either that my house was filled with spies sent by you, or else, that my attendants had taken up arms in so open a manner, that every one knew of it. What does my brother do ? That he may not seem to have formerly watched all my motions ; nor, at this time, to ground his accusation merely on suppositions, he beseeches you to inquire of those whom he shall name, whether people did not come armed to his house ; in order that, as if this were a doubtful circumstance, after this inquiry into an incident which they themselves own and confess, they may be considered as legally convicted. But is this the question? Why do not you desire an inquiry to be made, whether they took up arms to assassinate you, and if they did it with my knowledge, and at my request? For, it is this you pretend; and, not what they themselves own publicly, and which is very manifest, that they took up arms in no other view, but to defend themselves. Whether they had or had not reason to arm themselves, that they are to inform you. Do not blend and confound my cause with theirs, for they are quite distinct and separate. Only tell us, whether we really intended to attack you openly, or by surprise. If openly, why did we not all take up arms? Why were those only armed, who had insulted your spy? In case it was to have been by surprise, in what manner would the attack have been made? Would it have been at the end of the feast in your house, and after I had left it with my company, would the four men in question have staid behind, to have fallen upon you when asleep? How would it have been possible for them, as they were strangers, in my service, to conceal themselves in your house; and, as they could not but be very much suspected, having been seen, but a few hours before, engaged in the quarrel? Again, supposing they had found an opportunity to murder you, in what manner could they have escaped? Could four men, armed, have been able to make themselves masters of your house?

“But, to leave this nocturnal fiction, and to come to what really pains you, and which you have so much at heart; for what reason, methinks I hear my brother say, wherefore, O Demetrius, do the people talk of making you king? Why do some persons think you more worthy than I, of succeeding our father? Why do you make my hopes doubtful and uncertain, which, were it not for you, would have been established on the most solid foundation? Such are the reflections which Perseus revolves in his mind, though he does not express himself in this manner; it is this raises his enmity against me, and prompts him to charge me with such horrid attempts; it is this fills the palace, and every part of the kingdom, with suspicions and accusations. If it does not become me, sir, so much as to hope the sceptre, nor, perhaps, ever to think of contesting it, because it is your will and pleasure that I should yield to my elder brother, it does not follow that I ought to make myself appear unworthy of it, either to you,^h my royal father, or to all the Macedonians; a circumstance which nothing but my ill conduct could occasion. I can, indeed, through moderation, resign it to whom it belongs; but I cannot prevail with myself to renounce my virtue and good name.

“ You reproach me with the affection of the Romans, and impute that to me for a crime which ought to be my glory. I did not desire to be sent to Rome, neither as an hostage at first, nor afterwards as ambassador; this, sir, you yourself very well know. When you ordered me to go thither, I obeyed your commands; and I believe my conduct and behaviour were such, as cannot reflect the least dishonour, either on yourself, your crown, or the Macedonian nation. It is therefore yourself, sir, who occasioned the friendship I have contracted with the Romans. So long as you shall be at peace with them, so long our friendship will subsist; but the moment the trumpet sounds for war, though I have been an hostage among them, and exercised the functions of an ambassador in such a manner as perhaps has not been disadvantageous to my father; from that moment, I say, I shall declare myself their enemy. I do not desire to reap any benefit on the present occasion, from the love which the Romans have for me; all I entreat is, that it may not be of prejudice to me. It was not begun in war, nor is it designed to subsist in it. As an hostage and an ambassador, peace was my only object; let that be neither considered in me as a crime, or a merit.

^h Instead of “indignus te patre,” Gronovius reads, “indignus tibi pater;” which seems to agree better with the context.

“If I have violated, in any manner, the respect I owe you, sir; if I have formed any criminal enterprise against my brother, let me be punished as I deserve; but, if I am innocent, this I claim; that as I cannot be convicted of the least guilt, I may not fall a victim to envy. This is not the first time that my brother has charged me with harbouring horrid designs; but it is the first time he has attempted to do it openly, though without the least foundation. Was my father exasperated against me, it would be your duty, as the elder, kindly to intercede for your younger brother; to solicit his pardon, to entreat that some regard might be shown to his youth; and that a fault, which had been committed merely through inadvertency, might be overlooked. My ruin comes from that very quarter, whence I might naturally have expected my safety.

“ Though not quite awake, after the feast and party of pleasure, I am dragged hither on a sudden, to answer a charge of fratricide ; and am forced to plead my own cause, unassisted by counsellors, and unsupported by the advice or credit of a single person. Had I been to speak in favour of another, I should have taken time to prepare and compose my discourse ; and, yet, on such an occasion, my reputation only would have laid at stake, and I should have had nothing to do but to display my wit and eloquence. At this instant, without knowing the cause for which I am ordered to appear in this place, I hear an offended father commanding me to make my defence ; and a brother charging me with the most horrid crimes. Perseus has had all the time he could desire, to prepare his accusation ; whilst unhappy I, did not so much as know what the business was, till the very instant the accusation was brought against me. In this rapid moment, ought I to be more attentive to my accuser, than studious of my own apology ? Surprised by a sudden and unforeseen accusation, I could scarce comprehend what was laid to my charge, so far from being able to know how to make a defence. What hopes, what refuge could I have left, did I not know that it is my royal father who is to judge ? He may show a greater affection for my brother, as the elder ; but he owes more compassion to me, as being the party accused ; I myself conjure you to preserve my life, for your own sake and mine ; whereas, Perseus insists upon your sacrificing me to his safety. What may you not naturally expect from him, when you shall once have invested him with your authority, as he now demands your favour in preference to me, at no less a price than my blood?"

Whilst Demetrius defended himself in this manner, his words were interrupted by deep sighs and groans, intermixed with tears. Philip, dismissing both of them for a moment, advised with his friends; and then, ordering them to be called in again, he told them; "I will not pronounce sentence on this affair, from mere words, and a few transient speeches; but, from the inquiry I shall make into your conduct; from your behaviour in small, as well as great things, and from your words as well as actions." This judgment showed plainly enough, that, although Demetrius had cleared himself, with regard to the charge of endeavouring to take away his brother's life, Philip, however, suspected him, from his union with the Romans. These were, in a manner, the first sparks of the war that appeared in Philip's life time, and which were to break into a flame, under Perseus, his successor.

ⁱ The king, some time after, sent Philocles and Apelles, as his ambassadors, to Rome, not so much with the design of employing them in any negotiation, as to inquire how the inhabitants of that city stood affected with regard to Demetrius; and, to inquire secretly into what he had said there, particularly to Quintius, with regard to the succession to the throne. Philip imagined, that these two men were not attached to any party; but, they were Perseus's adherents, and had engaged in his conspiracy. Demetrius, who knew nothing of what was transacting, his brother's accusation excepted, had no hopes of ever being able to pacify his father ; especially, when he found that his brother had so ordered matters, that he could not have the least access to him. All he therefore endeavoured, was, to keep a watchful guard over his words and actions, in order to shun all occasions of suspicion and envy. He avoided speaking of the Romans, or holding the least correspondence with them, even by letter ; knowing it was this that chiefly incensed the Macedonians against him. He ought to have taken these precautions sooner ; but, this young prince, who had no experience, and was frank and sincere in all things, and judged of others from himself, imagined he had nothing to fear from a court, with whose intrigues and artifices he ought to have been better acquainted.

ⁱ A. M. 3823. Ant. J. C. 181. Liv. l. xlix. n. 20—24.

Philip, from a vulgar opinion which prevailed in Macedon, that from the top of mount Hemus, the Black Sea and the Adriatic, as well as the Danube and the Alps, might be discovered, was curious to have an ocular demonstration of it ; imagining, that this prospect might be of some service to the design he meditated, of making Italy the seat of war. He only took Perseus with him, and sent Demetrius into Macedonia ; appointing Didas, governor of Peonia, and one of the king's chief officers, to escort him. This governor was a creature of Perseus, who had taught him his lesson perfectly ; and exhorted him, above all things, to insinuate himself, as artfully as possible, into the opinion of the young prince, in order to discover all his secrets.

Didas executed his commission but too well. He agreed to every thing that Demetrius said, lamented his ill fate, seemed to detest the injustice and insincerity of his enemies, who represented him, on all occasions, in the most odious light to his father; and, offered to serve him to the utmost, in whatever lay in his power. Demetrius at last resolved to fly to the Romans. He fancied that heaven had opened him a certain means, for it was necessary to pass through Peonia, of which Didas, as I observed above, was governor; and, accordingly, he revealed his design to him. Didas, without loss of time, sent advice of this to Perseus, and the latter to king Philip; who, after having undergone inexpressible fatigues in his journey up mount Hemus, was returned with no better informations from his inquiry, than he carried with him. The monarch and his attendants did not, however, refute the vulgar opinion; in all probability, that they might not expose so ridiculous a journey to the laughter of the public; rather than because they had seen, from one and the same spot, rivers, seas, and mountains, at so vast a distance from one another. However that were, the king was, at that time, employed in the siege of a city called Petra, where the news I have mentioned was brought him. Herodotus, Demetrius's bosom friend, was seized, and strict orders were given, to keep a watchful eye over the prince.

Philip, at his return to Macedon, was seized with a deep melancholy. This last attempt of Demetrius went to his heart. He thought, however, that it would be proper for him to wait till the return of the ambassadors whom he had sent to Rome, and who had been taught their lesson before they left Macedon. They reported exactly whatever had been dictated to them ; and, presented the king with a forged letter, sealed with the counterfeit seal of T. Quintius, in which he desired Philip “not to be offended at his son Demetrius, for some unguarded expressions which might have escaped him, with respect to the succession to the crown ; assuring him, that he would not engage in any attempt contrary to the ties of blood and nature.” He concluded with observing, “that it was never in his thoughts to give him such counsel.” This letter confirmed all that Perseus had advanced against his brother. Herodotus was put to the torture, and died on the rack, without charging his master with any thing.

Perseus again accused his brother before the king. His having projected the design of flying to the Romans, through Peonia ; and, of bribing certain persons to accompany him in his flight, was imputed to him. But the circumstance which bore hardest against him was, the forged letter of Quintius. His father, nevertheless, did not declare himself publicly against him, resolving to make away with him secretly ; not out of regard to his son, but lest the noise which the bringing him to execution would make, should discover too visibly the designs he projected against Rome. At his leaving Thessalonica, to go for Demetrias, he commanded Didas to despatch the young prince. The latter, having carried Demetrius with him into Peonia, poisoned him at an entertainment that was made after a sacrifice. Demetrius had no sooner drank the deadly draught, but he found himself seized with violent pains. He withdrew to his apartment, complaining bitterly of his father's cruelty, and loudly charging his brother with the crime of fratricide, and Didas with his barbarous treachery. His pains increasing, two of Didas's domestics entered the room, threw blankets over his head, and stifled him. Such was the end of this young prince, who deserved a much better fate.

* Almost two years were elapsed, before the conspiracy of Perseus against his brother was discovered. In the mean time, Philip, tortured by grief and remorse, incessantly deplored his son's murder, and reproached himself with his cruelty. His surviving son, who looked upon himself already as king; and, to whom the courtiers began to attach themselves, from the expectation that he would soon be their sovereign, gave him no less pain. It was infinitely shocking to him to see his old age despised; some waiting, with the utmost impatience, for his death, and others even not waiting for it.

Among those who had access to him, Antigonus held the first rank. He was nephew of another Antigonus,¹ who had been Philip's guardian; and, under that name, and in that quality, had reigned ten years. This worthy man had always continued inviolably attached, both from duty and affection, to the person of his prince, in the midst of the tumults and cabals of the court. Perseus had never cared for him; but, this inviolable attachment to his father, made him his professed enemy. Antigonus plainly perceived the danger to which he would be exposed, when that prince should succeed to the crown. Finding that Philip began to fluctuate in thought; and would, from time to time, sigh and weep for his son Demetrius, he thought it proper to take advantage of that disposition; when, sometimes listening to his discourse on that subject, at other times beginning it himself, and regretting the precipitate manner in which that affair had been carried, he entered into his sentiments and complaints, and thereby gave them new force. And as truth always leaves some footsteps, by which it may be discerned, he used his utmost endeavours to trace out the secret intrigues of Perseus's conspiracy.

* A. M. 3825. Ant. J. C. 179. Liv. l. xl. n. 54—57.

¹ He was surnamed Doson.

The persons who had the greatest concern in that black affair, and of whom the strongest suspicion might be entertained, were Apelles and Philocles, who had been sent ambassadors to Rome, and had brought from thence, as in the name of Quintius Flamininus, the letter which had proved so fatal to the young prince. It was generally whispered at court, that this whole letter was forged; but still this was only conjecture, and there was no proof of it. Very luckily, Xychus, who had accompanied Apelles and Philocles, in quality of secretary of the embassy, happened upon some occasion to apply to Antigonus. Immediately he put him under an arrest, caused him to be carried to the palace, and leaving him under a strong guard, went to Philip. "I imagined," says he, "royal sir, from several things I have heard you say, that nothing could give you greater pleasure, than to know exactly what idea you ought to entertain of your two sons ; and to discover which of them it was that made an attempt on the other's life. You now have in your power, the man who is best able to give you a perfect account of that whole affair, and this is Xychus. He is now in your palace, and you may command him to be sent for." Xychus being immediately brought in, he first denied every thing ; but he spoke so very faintly, that it was evident he would make a full discovery, upon being ever so little intimidated. Accordingly, the instant that the officer of justice appeared, he made a full confession, revealed the whole intrigue of the ambassadors, and the share he himself had in it. Immediately Philocles, who happened to be in court at that time, was seized ; but Apelles, who was absent, hearing that Xychus had made a full discovery, fled to Italy. History does not inform us of the particulars which were extorted from Philocles. Some pretend, that, after having resolutely denied the charge at first, he was utterly confounded upon his being confronted with Xychus. According to other historians, he bore the torture with the utmost fortitude, and asserted his innocence to the last gasp. All these things only revived the sorrow of Philip ; a father equally wretched, whether he turned his reflections to his murdered son, or to him who was still living.

Perseus, being informed that his whole plot had been discovered, knew too well his own power and credit, to believe it necessary to secure himself by flight. The only precaution he took, was, a resolution to keep at a distance from court, as long as his father should live, in order to withdraw himself from his resentment.

Philip did not believe it in his power to seize Perseus, and bring him to condign punishment. The only thought he then entertained was, to prevent his enjoying, with impunity, the fruits of his inhuman guilt. In this view, he sent for Antigonus, to whose great care he owed the discovery of the conspiracy; and whom he judged very well qualified, both on account of his personal merit, and of his uncle Antigonus's recent fame and glory, to fill the Macedonian throne. "Reduced," says Philip, "to the deplorable necessity of wishing that my fate, which other fathers detest, as the most dreadful calamity that can befall them, the being childless; I now am resolving to bequeath to you a kingdom, which I owe to the guardianship of your uncle; and which, he not only preserved by his fidelity, but enlarged considerably by his valor. I know no man worthy of the crown but yourself. And were there none capable of wearing it with dignity, I had infinitely rather it should be lost for ever, than that Perseus should have it, as the reward of his impious perfidy. Methinks I shall see Demetrius rise from the sepulchre, and restored to his father, if I can be so happy as to substitute you in his place; you, who only bewailed the untimely death of my dear son, and the unhappy credulity which proved his destruction."

After this, he bestowed the highest honours on Antigonus, and took every opportunity of producing him in the most advantageous light to the public. Whilst Perseus resided in Thrace, Philip made a progress through several cities of Macedon, and recommended Antigonus to all the noblemen of the greatest distinction, with the utmost zeal and affection ; and, had fate allowed him a longer life, it was not doubted but he would have put him in possession of the throne. Having left Demetrius, he made a considerable stay in Thessalonica, from whence he went to Amphipolis, where he fell dangerously ill. The physicians declared, that his sickness proceeded more from his mind than his body. Grief kept him continually awake ; and, he frequently imagined he saw, in the dead of night, the ghost of the ill fated Demetrius, reproaching him with his death, and calling down curses on his head. He expired, bewailing one of his sons with a shower of tears, and venting the most horrid imprecations against the other. Antigonus might have been raised to the throne, had the king's death been immediately divulged. Calligenes, the physician, who presided in all the consultations, did not stay till the king had breathed his last ; but, the very instant he saw that it was impossible for him to recover, he despatched couriers to Perseus ; it having been agreed between them, that he should keep some in readiness for that purpose ; and, he concealed the king's death from every body out of the palace, till Perseus appeared, whose sudden arrival surprised all people. He then took possession of the crown, which he had acquired by guilt.

He reigned eleven years, the four last of which were employed in war against the Romans, for which he made preparations from his accession to the throne. At last, Paulus Emilius gained a famous victory over him, which put an end to the kingdom of Macedon. To prevent my being obliged to divide and interrupt the series of Perseus's history, which has scarce any connection with that of the other kings, I shall refer it to the following book, where it shall be related at large, and without interruption.

SECTION II.

SELEUCUS PHILOPATOR DIES, AND IS SUCCEDED BY ANTIOCHUS EPIPHANES. DISTURBANCES IN EGYPT AND PALESTINE.

SELEUCUS PHILOPATOR did not reign long in Asia, nor did he perform any memorable action. Under him, happened the famous incident concerning Heliodorus, related in the second book of Maccabees.^m The holy city of Jerusalem enjoyed, at that time, profound tranquillity. Onias, the high priest, inspired by a spirit of piety, caused the laws of God to be strictly observed there; and prompted even kings and idolatrous princes to have the holy place in the highest veneration. They honoured it with rich gifts; and king Seleucus furnished, from his own private revenues, all that was necessary for the solemnization of the sacrifices. Nevertheless, the perfidy of a Jew, called Simon, governor of the temple, raised, on a sudden, a great disorder in the city. This man, to revenge himself of the opposition which Onias, the high priest, made to his unjust enterprises, informed the king, that there were immense treasures in the temple, which were not designed for the service of the sacrifices, and, that he might seize upon them all. The king, on this information, sent Heliodorus, his first minister, to Jerusalem, with orders to carry off all those treasures.

^m 2 Maccabees, iii.

Heliodorus, after having been received by the high priest with honours of every kind, told him the motive of his journey ; and asked him, whether the information that had been given to the king, with regard to the treasure, was true. The high priest told him, that these treasures were only deposited there, as in trust, and were allotted to the maintenance of widows and orphans ; that he could not, in any manner, dispose of them in wrong of those to whom they belonged ; and who imagined that they could not secure them better, than by depositing them in a temple, the holiness of which was revered throughout the whole universe. This treasure consisted of four hundred talents of silver, about fifty thousand pounds sterling, and in two hundred talents of gold, three hundred thousand pounds sterling. However, the minister sent from the prince, insisting on the orders he had received from court, told him plainly, that this money, whatever might be the consequence, must all be carried to the king.

The day appointed for the carrying it off being come, Heliodorus came to the temple, with the resolution to execute his commission. Immediately, the whole city was seized with the utmost terror. The priests, dressed in their sacerdotal vestments, fell prostrate at the foot of the altar ; beseeching the God of heaven, who enacted the law with regard to deposits, to preserve those laid up in his temple. Great numbers flocked in crowds, and jointly besought the Creator, upon their knees, not to suffer so holy a place to be profaned. The women and maidens, covered with sackcloth, were seen lifting up their hands to heaven. It was a spectacle truly worthy of compassion; to see such multitudes, and especially the high priest, pierced with the deepest affliction, upon account of so impious a sacrilege.

By this time, Heliodorus, with his guards, was come to the gate of the treasury, and preparing to break it open. But the ⁿspirit of the Almighty now revealed itself by the most sensible marks; insomuch, that all those who had dared to obey Heliodorus, were struck down by a divine power, and seized with a terror which bereaved them of all their faculties. For, there appeared to them a horse richly caparisoned, which, rushing at once upon Heliodorus, struck him several times with his fore feet. The man who sat on this horse had a terrible aspect, and his arms seemed of gold. At the same time, there were seen two young men, whose beauty dazzled the eye; and who, standing on each side of Heliodorus, scourged him incessantly, and in the most violent manner, with their whips. Heliodorus, falling from his horse, was taken up, and put into his litter; and this man, who, a moment before, had come into the temple, followed by a great train of guards, was forced away from this holy place, and had no one to succour him; and that, because the power of God had displayed itself in the strongest manner. By the same power, he was cast to the ground, speechless, and without showing the least sign of life ; whilst the temple, which before resounded with nothing but lamentations, now echoed with the shouts of all the people, who returned thanks to the Almighty, for having raised the glory of his holy temple, by the effect of his power.

ⁿ Sed spiritus omnipotentis Dei magnam fecit suæ ostentationis evidentiam.

But now, some of Heliodorus's friends besought the high priest to invoke God in his favour. Immediately Onias offered a sacrifice for his health. Whilst he was praying, the two young men above mentioned appeared to Heliodorus, and said to him ; " Return thanks to Onias, the high priest ; for, it is for his sake that the Lord has granted you life. After having been scourged from heaven, declare to the whole world his miraculous power." Having spoken these words, they vanished.

Heliodorus offered up sacrifices, and made solemn vows to him who had restored him to life. He returned thanks to Onias, and went his way ; declaring, to every one, the wonderful works of the Almighty, to which he himself had been an eye witness. The king asking him, whether he believed that another person might be sent with safety to Jerusalem, he answered ; " In case you have an enemy, or any traitorous wretch who has a design upon your crown, send him thither, and you will see him return back quite flayed with scourging ; and he, perhaps, may die under it. For, he who inhabiteth the heavens, is himself present in that place ; he is the guardian and protector of it ; and he strikes those mortally who go thither to injure it."

The king was soon punished for this sacrilegious act, by the very man whom he had commanded to plunder the temple. Antiochus the Great, having, after his defeat at Sypilus, concluded the ignominious peace with the Romans before mentioned, had given them, among other hostages, Antiochus, one of his sons, and the younger brother of Seleucus. ° He resided thirteen years in Rome. Seleucus his brother wanted him, but for what reason is not known ; perhaps, to put him at the head of some military expedition, which he might judge him capable of executing ; and to obtain him, he sent Demetrius, his only son, who was but twelve years of age, to Rome, as an hostage, in Antiochus's room. ¶ During the absence of the two heirs to the crown, one of whom was gone to Rome, and the other not returned from it, Heliodorus imagined he might, with very little difficulty, seize upon it, by taking off Seleucus, and accordingly he poisoned him.

In this manner was fulfilled the prophecy of Daniel. After speaking of the death of Antiochus the Great, he adds, “ Then shall stand up in his estate a raiser of taxes in the glory of the kingdom ; but within few days † he shall be destroyed, neither in anger nor in battle.” These few words denote evidently the short and obscure reign of Seleucus, and the kind of death he was to die. The Hebrew text points him out still more clearly. “ There shall arise up in his place,” of Antiochus, “ a man who, as an extortioner, a collector • Appian. in Syr. p. 116.

‡ A. M. 3829. Ant. J. C. 175.

† Dan. xi. 20.

‡ The Hebrew word may signify either days or years.

of taxes, shall cause to pass away, and" shall destroy "the glory of the kingdom." And indeed, this was the sole employment of his reign. He was obliged to furnish the Romans, by the articles of the peace concluded between them, one thousand talents^a annually; and the twelve years of this tribute end exactly with his life. He reigned but eleven years.

^a Antiochus, afterwards surnamed Epiphanes, who was returning from Rome into Syria, had advice brought at Athens, of the death of his brother Seleucus. He was told, that the usurper had a very strong party, but that another was forming in favour of Ptolemy, whose claim was founded in right of his mother, the late king's sister. Antiochus had recourse to Eumenes, king of Pergamus, and to Attalus his brother, who seated him on the throne, after having expelled Heliodorus.

The prophet Daniel, from verse 21, of chapter xi. to the end of chapter xii. foretells every thing that was to befall Antiochus Epiphanes, who was a cruel persecutor of the Jews, and who is pointed out elsewhere by the ^u "little horn which was to issue out of one of the four large horns." I shall explain this prophecy hereafter.

Here, chap. xi. ver. 21, the prophet describes his accession to the throne. "And in his," Seleucus's, "estate shall stand up a vile person, to whom they shall not give the honour of the kingdom; but he shall come in peaceably, and obtain the kingdom by flatteries." Antiochus's conduct shall show how vile he was. It is said, "that to him they shall not give the honours of the kingdom." He did not obtain the crown, either by right of birth, as his brother Seleucus had left behind him a son, who was his lawful heir, nor by the free choice of the people; Eumenes and Attalus having set it on his head. Being returned from the west "peaceably, or rather secretly," to surprise his rival, he won the hearts of the people by his artifices, and a specious appearance of clemency.

^a About one hundred and fifty thousand pounds.

^c Appian. in Syr. p. 116, 117. Hieron. in Dan.

^u Dan. viii. 9.

† He assumed the title of Epiphanes, that is, illustrious, which title was never worse applied. The whole series of his life will show, that he deserved much more that of Epimanes, mad or furious, which some people gave him.

Some circumstances related of him, prove how justly the epithet "vile" is bestowed upon him in scripture. He used frequently to go out of his palace, accompanied only by two or three domestics, and ramble up and down the streets of Antioch. He would spend his time in talking with goldsmiths and engravers, in their shops, and in disputing with them on the most minute particulars relating to the arts they professed, and which he ridiculously boasted he understood as well as they. He would very often stoop so low as to converse with the dregs of the populace, and mix indiscriminately with them in the places where they were assembled. On these occasions he would sit and drink with foreigners of the meanest condition of life. Whenever he heard of any party of pleasure between young people, he used to go, without saying a word to any person, and join in all their wanton fooleries; would carouse and sing with them, without observing the least order or decorum. He sometimes would take it into his head to divest himself of his royal habit, and put on a Roman robe; and, in that garb, would go from street to street, as he had seen the candidates do in the election for dignities. He asked the citizens to favour him with their votes, by giving his hand to one, by embracing another; and sometimes would set up for edile, and at other times for tribune. After having got himself elected, he would call for the curule chair;^w when, seating himself in it, he judged the petty suits relating to contracts of buying or selling; and pronounced sentence with as much seriousness and gravity as if he decided affairs of the utmost importance. We are likewise told, that he was very much given to drinking; that he squandered away a great part of his revenues in excess and debauch; and that, when intoxicated with liquor, he would frequently scour up and down the city, throwing away handfuls of money among the populace, and crying, "catch as catch can." At other times, he would leave his palace, dressed in a Roman robe, with a crown of roses on his head, and walk without attendants about the streets; on which occasions, if any person offered to follow him, he used to pelt him with stones, always carrying a great quantity under his robe for that purpose. He used often to go and bathe himself in the public baths, with the common people, where he committed such extravagances, as made every body despise him. After what has been said, and I omit a great many other particulars, I submit to the reader's judgment, whether Antiochus did not merit the title of senseless, rather than that of illustrious.

† Athen. l. v. p. 193.

^w This was an ivory chair, which was allowed in Rome to none but the chief magistrates.

* Scarce was Antiochus well seated on the throne, but Jason, brother of Onias, the Jewish high priest, having formed a design to supplant his brother, offered that prince, secretly, three hundred and sixty talents, about ninety thousand pounds sterling, besides eighty more, about twelve thousand pounds, for another article, upon condition that he should appoint him high priest. He succeeded in his negotiation; and accordingly Onias, who was universally revered for his strict piety and justice, was deposed, and Jason established in his room. The latter subverted entirely the religion of his ancestors, and brought infinite calamities upon the Jewish nation, as appears from the second book of the Maccabees, and Josephus.

† In Egypt, from the death of Ptolemy Epiphanes, Cleopatra his widow, sister of Antiochus Epiphanes, had assumed the regency, and the tuition of her young son, and had acquitted herself with the greatest care and prudence.

But dying that year, the regency fell to Leneus, a nobleman of great distinction in that country; and Euleus the eunuch, was appointed to superintend the king's education. These were no sooner in their employments, but they sent a deputation to demand Celosyria and Palestine of Antiochus Epiphanes ; a demand that very soon after occasioned a war between the two crowns. Cleopatra, who was mother of one of these kings, and sister to the other, had prevented them, as long as she lived, from coming to a rupture. But the new regents did not show so much regard for Antiochus, nor scruple to demand of him what they believed their sovereign's right. ^z It is certain, that the Egyptian monarchs had always possessed the sovereignty of these provinces, from the first Ptolemy, till Antiochus the Great dispossessed Ptolemy Epiphanes of them, and left them to Seleucus, his son, with no other right than that of conquest. They had descended from the latter, to his brother Antiochus.

* A. M. 3830. Ant. J. C. 174. 2 Maccab. c. iv.

† A. M. 3831. Ant. J. C. 173. Hieron. in Dan:

The Egyptians, to enforce their pretensions, declared, that, in the last division of the empire between the four successors of Alexander, who possessed themselves of all countries after the battle of Ipsus, these provinces had been assigned to Ptolemy Soter ; that himself, and his successors to the crown of Egypt, had enjoyed them from that time, till the battle of Paneas, the gaining of which had enabled Antiochus the Great to dispossess Egypt of those provinces ; that this prince had stipulated, when he gave his daughter to the king of Egypt, to restore to him, at the same time, those provinces as her dowry ; and, that this was the principal article of the marriage contract.

Antiochus denied both these facts ; and pretended that, on the contrary, in the general division which had been made of Alexander's empire, all Syria, including ^z Polyb. in Leg. c. 72—82.

Celosyria and Palestine, had been assigned to Seleucus Nicator ; and that, consequently, they belonged justly to the prince in possession of the kingdom of Syria. With regard to the marriage contract, by virtue of which the Egyptians demanded back those provinces, he asserted, that it was an absolute chimera. In fine, after having given their reasons on both sides, without coming to any conclusion, they found it necessary to decide their pretensions by force of arms.

^a Ptolemy Philometor, being entered his fifteenth year, was declared of age. Great preparations were made in Alexandria, for the solemnity of his coronation, according to the Egyptian custom. Antiochus sent Apollonius, one of the chief noblemen of his court, with the character of ambassador, to be present on that occasion, and to congratulate him upon it, in his name. This, in outward appearance, was done in honour of his nephew ; but, the real motive was, to discover, if possible, the designs of that court with respect to the provinces of Celosyria and Palestine, as well as what measures were taking with regard to them. The instant he heard, on the return of Apollonius, that all things were preparing for war, he went by sea to Joppa, visited the frontiers of the country, and put it into a condition of defending itself against all the attacks of the Egyptians.

In his progress, he took Jerusalem in his way. Jason, and the whole city, received him there with the greatest pomp and magnificence. Notwithstanding the honours paid him in Jerusalem, he afterwards brought great calamities on that city, and the whole.

^a 1 Maccab. iv. 21, 22.

Jewish nation. From Jerusalem he went to Phenicia; and, after having settled all things, in every place through which he passed, he returned to Antioch.

^b The same Apollonius had been sent, by Antiochus, to Rome, at the head of an embassy. He made excuses to the senate, for his master's having sent the tribute later than was stipulated by the treaty. Besides the sum due, he made a present to the people, of several golden vases. He demanded, in that prince's name, that the alliance and friendship, which had been granted to his father, should be renewed with him; and desired, that the Romans would give him such orders as suited a king, who valued himself on being their affectionate and faithful ally. He added, that his sovereign could never forget the great favours he had received from the senate; from all the youths of Rome, and from persons of all ranks and conditions, during his abode in that city, where he had been treated, not merely as an hostage, but as a monarch. The senate made an obliging answer to these several particulars, and dismissed Apollonius with the highest marks of distinction, and laden with presents. It was well known, from the Roman ambassadors who had been in Syria, that he was very much esteemed by the king, and had the highest regard for the Romans.

^c Jason, the year following, sent his brother Menelaus to Antioch, to pay the tribute to the king, and to negotiate some other affairs of great importance. But that perfidious wretch, in the audience to which he was admitted, instead of confining himself to the orders of his commission, supplanted his brother, and obtained his office, by offering three hundred talents more than he did. This new choice gave rise to tumults, disorders, murders, and sacrilegious acts; but, the death of Onias, who was universally beloved and revered, crowned the whole. Antiochus, though so very hard hearted, however, lamented his death, and brought the murderer to condign punishment. I make only a transient mention of these facts, and omit the principal circumstances of them, because they belong properly to the history of the Jews, which does not enter into my plan, and, of which I relate only such particulars at large, as are too important to be entirely omitted, or abridged in such a manner as to preserve their beauty.

^b Liv. l. xl. n. 6.

^c A. M. 3832. Ant. J. C. 172. 2 Maccab. iv. 23, &c.

^d Antiochus, who, from the return of Apollonius from the Egyptian court, had been preparing for war, with which he saw himself threatened by Ptolemy, on account of Celosyria and Palestine; finding himself in a condition to begin it, resolved not to wait for it in his own dominions, but to carry his arms into the enemy's country. He imagined, that as Ptolemy was but sixteen, and was governed entirely by weak ministers, he should be able to bring him to what terms he pleased. He was persuaded that the Romans, under whose protection the Egyptians had put themselves, were engaged in so many affairs, that it would be impossible for them to give the latter the least succour; and, that the war they were carrying on against Perseus, king of Macedon, would not allow them leisure for it. In a word, he thought the present juncture very favourable for him to decide his difference with the Egyptians, on account of those provinces.

^d A. M. 3833. Ant. J. C. 171. Liv. l. xlii. n. 9. Polyb. in Leg. c. 71; 72. Justin. l. xxxiv. c. 2. Diod. Leg. xviii. Hieron. in Daniel.

In the mean time, to observe measures with the Romans, he sent ambassadors to the senate, to represent the right he had to the provinces of Celosyria and Palestine, of which he was actually possessed, and the necessity he was under of engaging in a war, in order for the support of them ; immediately after which, he put himself at the head of his army, and marched towards the frontiers of Egypt. Ptolemy's army came up with his, near mount Casius and Pelusium, and fought a battle, in which Antiochus was victorious. He made so good an use of his success, that he put the frontier in a condition to serve as a barrier, and to check the utmost efforts the Egyptians might make to recover those provinces. This was his first expedition into Egypt ; after which, without engaging in any other enterprise that year, he returned to Tyre, and made the neighbourhood of it the winter quarters for his army.

° During his stay there, three persons, deputed from the sanhedrim of Jerusalem, came to complain of Menelaus, whom they proved to be guilty, in his presence, of impiety and sacrilege. The king was going to condemn him ; but, at the request of Ptolemy Macron, one of his ministers in the interest of Menelaus, he cleared him, and put to death the three deputies, as false witnesses ; “ An action,” says the author of the Maccabees, “ so very unjust, that, before the Scythians, they would have been judged innocent.” The Tyrians, touched with compassion at their unhappy fate, gave them honourable interment.

° A. M. 3834. Ant. J. C. 170. 2 Maccab. iv. 44—50.

† 2 Maccab. iv. 47.

‡ This Ptolemy Macron, having formerly been governor of the island of Cyprus, under king Ptolemy Philometor, had kept, in his own hands, during the minority of that monarch, all the revenues of that country; and, could never be prevailed on to deliver them up to the ministers, though they made the warmest instances upon that head; but, had constantly refused to regard them, from justly suspecting their fidelity. At the coronation of the king, he brought the whole treasure to Alexandria, and deposited it in the exchequer. A rare instance of a noble disregard of wealth, in a man who had all the finances at his disposal! So considerable a sum, and coming at a time when the government was in extreme want of money, had done him great honour, and gained him prodigious credit at court. But afterwards, exasperated at some ill treatment he met with from the ministers; or, at his not having been rewarded for so important a service; he rebelled against Ptolemy, entered into Antiochus's service, and delivered up the island of Cyprus to him. That king received him with infinite satisfaction, took him into the number of his confidants; made him governor of Celosyria and Palestine, and sent to Cyprus, in his room, Crates, who had commanded in the castle at Jerusalem, under Sostratus. Large mention is made of this Ptolemy Macron, in the books of the Maccabees.

‡ Polyb. in Excerpt. Vales. p. 126. 2 Maccab. x. 13. viii. 8. iv. 29. and 1 Maccab. iii. 38.

^b Antiochus spent the whole winter in making fresh preparations for a second expedition into Egypt ; and, the instant the season would permit it, invaded that country both by sea and land. Ptolemy had raised a very considerable army, but without success ; for, Antiochus gained a second battle on the frontiers, took the city of Pelusium, and marched to the very centre of Egypt. In this last defeat of the Egyptians, it was in his power not to have suffered a single man to escape ; but, the more completely to ruin his nephew, instead of making use of the advantage he had gained, he himself rode up and down on all sides, and obliged his soldiers to discontinue the slaughter. This clemency gained him the hearts of the Egyptians ; and, when he advanced into the country, all the inhabitants came in crowds to pay their submission to him ; so that he soon took Memphis, and all the rest of Egypt, except Alexandria, which alone held out against him.

Philometor was either taken, or else surrendered himself to Antiochus, who set him at full liberty. After this, they had but one table ; lived, seemingly, in great friendship ; and, for some time, Antiochus affected to be extremely careful of the interests of the young king, his nephew, and to regulate his affairs as his guardian ; but, when he had once possessed himself of the country, under that pretext, he seized whatever he thought fit, plundered all places, and enriched himself, as well as his soldiers, with the spoils of the Egyptians.

^b 2 Maccab. v. 1. 1 Maccab. i. 17—20. Hieron. in Dan. Diod. in Excerpt. Vales. p. 311.

ⁱ Philometor made a miserable figure all this time. In the field, he had always kept as far as possible from danger, and had not even shown himself to those who fought for him; and, after the battle, in how abject a manner did he submit himself to Antiochus, by whom he suffered himself to be dispossessed of so fine a kingdom, without undertaking any thing to preserve it! This, however, was not so much owing to want of courage and natural capacity, for he afterwards gave proofs of both, as the effect of his soft and effeminate education, under Euleus, his governor. That eunuch, who also was his prime minister, had used his utmost endeavours to plunge him in luxury and effeminacy, in order to make him incapable of affairs; and, to make himself as necessary, when the young prince should be of age, as he had been during his minority, and thereby engross all power in his own hands.

^k Whilst Antiochus was in Egypt, a false report of his death spread throughout Palestine. Jason thought this a proper opportunity to recover the employment he had lost in that country. Accordingly, he marched, with a few more than a thousand men, to Jerusalem; and there, by the assistance of his partisans in the city, made himself master of it; drove out Menelaus, who withdrew to the citadel; exercised every species of cruelty upon his fellow citizens; and, unmercifully put to death all those who fell into his hands, and whom he considered as his enemies.

When advice of this was brought Antiochus, in Egypt, he concluded that the Jews had made a general ⁱ Justin. l. xxxiv. c. 2. Diod. in Excerpt. Vales. p. 310.

^k 1 Maccab. i. 20—29. 2 Maccab. v. 5—21. Joseph. Antiq. l. xii. c. 7. Diod. l. xxxiv. Eclog. 1. Hieron. in Dan.

insurrection, and therefore, set forward immediately to quell it. The circumstance which mostly exasperated him, was, his being informed, that the inhabitants of Jerusalem had made great rejoicings, when a false report had prevailed of his death. He, therefore, besieged the city, took it by storm; and, during the three days that it was abandoned to the fury of the soldiers, he caused fourscore thousand men to be inhumanly butchered. Forty thousand were also taken prisoners, and the like number sold to the neighbouring nations.

But, not yet satisfied, this impious monarch entered forcibly into the temple, as far as the sanctuary, and the most sacred places; even polluting, by his presence, the holy of holies, whither the traitor Menelaus led him. After this, adding sacrilege to profanation, he carried away the altar of perfumes, the table for the shewbread, the candlestick with seven branches, belonging to the sanctuary, all these were of gold; with several other vases, utensils, and gifts of kings, also of gold. He plundered the city, and returned to Antioch, laden with the spoils of Judea and Egypt, all which together amounted to immense sums.¹ To complete the calamity of the Jews, Antiochus, at his setting out, appointed, as governor over Judea, a Phrygian, Philip by name, a man of great cruelty. He nominated Andronicus, a man of the like barbarous disposition, governor of Samaria; and, bestowed on Menelaus, the most wicked of the three, the title of high priest, investing him with the authority annexed to that office.

¹ We are told, in the Maccabees, book ii. ch. i. ver. 14. that he carried off, from the temple, only one thousand eight hundred talents; which are equivalent to about two hundred and seventy thousand Pounds sterling.

^m Such was the beginning of the calamities which had been foretold to Jerusalem, by strange phenomena in the skies, that had appeared there, some time before, during forty days successively. These were men, some on horseback, and others on foot, armed with shields, lances, and swords; who, forming considerable bodies, combatted in the air, like two armies in battle.

ⁿ The Alexandrians, seeing Philometor in the hands of Antiochus, whom he suffered to govern his kingdom at discretion, considered him as lost to them; and, therefore, seated his younger brother upon the throne, which they first declared void. ^o On this occasion, he had the name of Ptolemy Evergetes II. given him, which was soon changed to that of Cacergetes; the former signifying beneficent, and the latter malevolent. He afterwards was nicknamed Physcon,^p or Tunbellied, because his immoderate eating had made him remarkably corpulent. ^q Most historians mention him under the latter epithet. Cineas and Cumanus were appointed his chief ministers, and were ordered to use their utmost endeavours to restore, if possible, the affairs of the kingdom to their former flourishing condition.

^m 2 Maccab. v. 2—4.

ⁿ A. M. 3835. Ant. J. C. 169. Porphy. in Græc. Euseb. Scalig.

^o Athen. l. iv. p. 184.

^p Φυσκων ventricosus, obesus, from φυσκη Crassum intestinum, venter.

^q Polyb. in Leg. c. lxxxi.

Antiochus, who had advice of what was transacting, took occasion, thereupon, to return a third time into Egypt, under the specious pretence of restoring the dethroned monarch ; but, in reality, to make himself absolute master of the kingdom. He defeated the Alexandrians in a sea fight, near Pelusium, marched his forces into Egypt, and advanced directly towards Alexandria, in order to besiege it. The young king consulted his two ministers, who advised him to summon a grand council, composed of all the principal officers of the army ; and, to deliberate with them, on the measures proper to be taken in the present exigency. After many debates, they came, at last, to this resolution ; that, as their affairs were reduced to so low an ebb, it would be absolutely necessary for them to endeavour a reconciliation with Antiochus ; and, that the ambassadors of the several states of Greece, who were in Alexandria at that time, should be desired to employ their mediation, to which they readily consented.

They went by water up the river to Antiochus with the overtures of peace, accompanied by two of Ptolemy's ambassadors, who had the same instructions. He gave them a very gracious reception in his camp, regaled them that day in a very magnificent manner, and appointed them to make their proposals on the morrow. The Achæans spoke first, and afterwards the rest in their turns. All were unanimous in their accusation of Euleus ; ascribing the calamities of the war to his mal administration, and to the minority of Ptolemy Philometor. At the same time, they apologized in a very artful manner for the new king and employed all the powers of their rhetoric to move Antiochus in his favour, in order to induce him to treat with Ptolemy; laying great stress on their affinity.

Antiochus, in the answer he gave, agreed entirely with them as to the cause and origin of the war; took occasion from thence to enforce the right he had to Celosyria and Palestine; alleged the reasons we have related above, and produced some authentic instruments, which were judged so strong, that all the members of this congress were convinced that he had the justest right to those provinces. As to the conditions of the peace, he postponed them till another opportunity; promising them that he would make preparations for a solemn treaty, as soon as two absent persons, whom he named, should be with him; declaring, at the same time, that he would not take a single step without them.

After this answer he decamped, came to Naucratis, marched from thence to Alexandria, and began to besiege it.^f In this extremity, Ptolemy Evergetes, and Cleopatra his sister, who were in the city, sent ambassadors to Rome; representing the calamity to which they were reduced, and imploring the aid of the Romans. The ambassadors appeared, in the audience to which they were admitted by the senate, with all the marks of sorrow used at that time, in the greatest afflictions, and made a speech still more affecting. They observed, that the authority of the Romans was so much revered, by all nations and kings; and that, Antiochus particularly had received so many obligations from them, that, if they would only declare, by their ambassadors, that the senate did not approve of his making war against kings in alliance with Rome, they did not doubt but Antiochus would immediately draw off his troops from Alexandria, and return to Syria ; that, should the senate refuse to afford them their protection, Ptolemy and Cleopatra, being expelled from their kingdom, would be immediately reduced to fly to Rome ; and, that it would reflect a dishonour on the Romans, should the world have an opportunity to say, that they had neglected to aid the king and queen, at a time when their affairs were so desperate.

^f Liv. l. xlv. n. 19. Polyb. Leg. xc.

The senate, moved with their remonstrances, and persuaded that it would not be for the interest of the Romans to suffer Antiochus to attain to such an height of power, which would be too formidable, should he unite the crown of Egypt to that of Syria, resolved to send an embassy to Egypt, to put an end to the war. C. Popilius Lenas, C. Decimus, and C. Hostilius, were appointed for this important negotiation. Their instructions were, that they should first wait upon Antiochus, and afterwards on Ptolemy ; should order them, in the name of the senate, to suspend all hostilities, and put an end to the war ; and that, should either of the parties refuse a compliance, the Romans would no longer consider them as their friend and ally. As the danger was imminent, three days after the resolution had been taken in the senate, they set out from Rome with the Egyptian ambassadors.

* A little before their departure, some Rhodian ambassadors arrived in Egypt, who came expressly to terminate, if possible, the divisions between the two crowns. They landed at Alexandria, and went from thence to Antiochus's camp. They did all that lay in their power to induce him to an accommodation with the king of Egypt; strongly insisting on the friendship with which both crowns had so long honoured them, and how nearly it concerned them to employ their good offices, in order to settle a lasting peace between them. As they expatiated considerably on these common places, Antiochus interrupted them, and declared in a few words, that they had no occasion to make long harangues on this subject; that the crown belonged to the elder of the two brothers, with whom he had concluded a peace, and contracted a strict friendship; that, if he were recalled and replaced upon the throne, the war would be ended at once.

* Polyb. Leg. lxxxiv.

‘ He said these words, but harboured a very different design; his view being only to perplex affairs, for the attainment of his own ends. The resistance he met with from Alexandria, the siege of which he plainly saw he should be forced to raise, obliged him to change his plan, and conclude, that, it would henceforward be his interest to keep up an enmity, and occasion a war between the two brothers, which might weaken them to such a degree, that it should be in his power to overpower both whenever he pleased. In this view he raised the siege, marched towards Memphis, and gave Philometor, in outward appearance, possession of the whole kingdom, Pelusium excepted, which he kept as a key for entering Egypt when he pleased, and the instant matters should be ripe for his purpose. After having made these dispositions, he returned to Antioch.

‘Liv. l. xlv. n. 11.

Philometor began at last to wake from the lethargy into which his indolent effeminacy had plunged him, and to be sensible of all the calamities these revolutions had brought upon him. He had even natural penetration enough to see through Antiochus's design; and that king's keeping possession of Pelusium, entirely opened his eyes. He saw plainly, that he kept this key of Egypt with no other view but to reenter by it, when his brother and himself should be reduced so low as to be unable to make the least resistance; and, that then, both would fall victims to his ambition. The instant, therefore, that Antiochus marched away, he sent to inform his brother that he desired they might come to an accommodation, which was accordingly effected, by the mediation of Cleopatra their sister, on condition that the two brothers should reign jointly. Philometor returned to Alexandria, and Egypt was restored to its former tranquillity, to the great joy of the inhabitants, particularly those of Alexandria, who had suffered exceedingly during the war.

Had Antiochus spoken from his heart, when he declared that the sole design of his coming into Egypt was to restore Philometor to his throne, he would have been pleased to hear that the two brothers were reconciled. But, he was far from entertaining such thoughts; and I before observed, that he concealed, beneath those specious professions, an intention to crush the two brothers, after they should have reduced each other by a war.

▪ The brothers, convinced that Antiochus would again invade them with great vigor, sent ambassadors into Greece, to desire some auxiliary forces from the Achæans. The assembly was held in Corinth. The two kings requested only one thousand foot, under the command of Lycortas; and two hundred horse, under Polybius. They had also given orders for raising one thousand mercenary troops. Callicrates, who presided in the assembly, opposed the request made by the ambassadors, upon pretence that it would not be for the interest of the Achæan confederates, to concern themselves in any manner with foreign affairs; but, that they ought to preserve their soldiers, to be in a condition to aid the Romans, who, it was believed, would soon come to a battle with Perseus. Lycortas and Polybius then speaking, observed, among other things, that Polybius having been, the year before, with Marcius, who commanded the Roman army in Macedonia, to offer him the aid which the Achæan league had decreed to send him; the consul thanked him, and said, that as he had got footing in Macedonia, he should not want the aid of the allies; and, therefore, that the Achæans could not have that pretext for abandoning the kings of Egypt. Besides, that as the league was able, without the least inconveniency, to levy thirty or forty thousand men; consequently, so small a number as was desired by the Egyptian princes, would not lessen their strength; that, the ▪ Polyb. Leg. lxxxix—xci.

Achean confederates ought to embrace the opportunity they now had of aiding the two kings ; that, it would be the highest ingratitude in them to forget the favours they had received from the Egyptians ; and, that their refusal, on this occasion, would be a violation of the treaties and oaths on which the alliance was founded. As the majority were for granting the aid, Callicrates dismissed the ambassadors, upon pretence that it was contrary to the laws, to debate on an affair of that nature in such an assembly.

It therefore was held, some time after, in Sicyon ; and, as the members were upon the point of taking the same resolution, Callicrates read a forged letter from Q. Marcius, by which the Achæans were exhorted to employ their mediation for terminating the war between the two Ptolemies and Antiochus, and, in consequence caused a decree to pass, whereby the Achean confederates agreed to send only an embassy to those princes.

¶ The instant that Antiochus heard of the reconciliation of the two brothers, he resolved to employ his whole force against them. Accordingly, he sent his fleet early into Cyprus, to preserve the possession of that island ; at the same time, he marched at the head of a very powerful land army, with the design to conquer Egypt openly, and not pretend, as he had before done, to fight the cause of one of his nephews. Upon his arrival at Rhinocorura, he found ambassadors from Philometor, who told him, that their sovereign was very sensible that he owed his restoration to Antiochus ; that he conjured him not to destroy his own work by employing fire and sword ; but, on the contrary, to acquaint him amicably with his pretensions. Antiochus, throwing off the mask, no longer used the tender and affectionate expressions, of which he had, till then, been so ostentatiously lavish, but declared himself at once an enemy to both. He told the ambassadors that he insisted upon having the island of Cyprus, with the city of Pelusium, and all the land along the arm of the Nile, on which it was situated, resigned to him for ever ; assuring them, that he was determined to conclude a peace upon no other conditions. He also fixed a day for a final answer to his demand.

¶ A. M. 3836. Ant. J. C. 168. Liv. l. xlv. n. 11—13. Polyb. Leg. xcii.

The time being elapsed, and the satisfaction he pretended to require not being made, he began hostilities ; penetrated as far as Memphis, subjecting the whole country through which he passed ; and there received the submission of almost all the rest of the kingdom. He afterwards marched toward Alexandria, with design to besiege that city, the possession of which would have made him absolute master of all Egypt. He would certainly have succeeded in his enterprise, had he not been checked in his career by the Roman embassy, which broke all the measures he had been so long taking, in order to possess himself of Egypt.

We before observed, that the ambassadors who were nominated to go to Egypt, had left Rome with the utmost diligence. They landed at Alexandria, just at the time Antiochus was marching to besiege it. The ambassadors came up with him at Eleusine, ^w which was not a mile from Alexandria. The king seeing Popilius, with whom he had been intimately acquainted at Rome, when he was an hostage in that city, opened his arms to embrace him as his old friend. The Roman, who did not consider himself on that occasion as a private man, but a servant of the public, desired to know, before he answered his compliment, whether he spoke to a friend, or an enemy of Rome. He then gave him the decree of the senate, bid him read it over, and return him an immediate answer. Antiochus, after perusing it, said, that he would examine the contents of it with his friends, and give his answer in a short time. Popilius, enraged at the king for talking of delays, drew, with the wand he held in his hand, a circle round Antiochus, and then, raising his voice; "Answer," says he, "the senate, before you stir out of that circle." The king, quite confounded at so haughty an order, after a moments reflection, replied, that he would act according to the desire of the senate. Popilius then received his civilities; and behaved afterwards, in all respects, as an old friend. * How effectual was this blunt loftiness of sentiments and expression! The Roman, with a few words, strikes terror into the king of Syria, and saves the king of Egypt.

^w Turnebius and H. Valesius think that we should read, in Livy, "Eleusinem" instead of "Leusinem."

The circumstance which made the one so bold, and the other so submissive, was, the news that arrived just before, of the great victory gained by the Romans, over Perseus, king of Macedonia. From that instant, every thing gave way before them; and the

* Quam efficax est animi sermonisque abscissa gravitas! Eodem momento Syria regnum terruit, Ægypti texit. Val. Max. l. vi. c. 4.

Roman name grew formidable to all princes and nations.

Antiochus having left Egypt at the time stipulated, Popilius returned, with his colleagues, to Alexandria, where he signed the treaty of union between the two brothers, which had not been executed before. He then crossed into Cyprus ; sent home Antiochus's fleet, which had gained a victory over that of the Egyptians ; restored the whole island to the kings of Egypt, who laid a just claim to it ; and, returned to Rome, in order to acquaint the senate with the success of his embassy.

Ambassadors from Antiochus, the two Ptolemics, and Cleopatra their sister, arrived there, almost at the same time. The former said, "That the peace which the senate had been pleased to grant their sovereign, appeared to him more glorious than the most splendid conquests ; and, that he had obeyed the commands of the Roman ambassadors as strictly as if they had been sent from the gods." How groveling, and, at the same time, how impious was all this ! They afterwards congratulated the Romans on the victory they had gained over Perseus. The rest of the ambassadors declared, in the like extravagant strain, "That the two Ptolemics and Cleopatra thought themselves bound, in as great obligations, to the senate and people of Rome, as to their parents, and even to the gods ; having been delivered, by the protection which Rome had granted them, from a very grievous siege, and reestablished on the throne of their ancestors, of which they had been almost entirely dispossessed." The senate answered, "That Antiochus acted wisely, in in paying obedience to the ambassadors ; and, that the people and senate of Rome were pleased with him for it." Methinks this is carrying the spirit of haughtiness as high as possible. With regard to Ptolemy and Cleopatra, it was answered, " That the senate were very much pleased with the opportunity of doing them some service ; and, that they would endeavour to make them sensible, that they ought to look upon the friendship and protection of the Romans, as the most solid support of their kingdom." The pretor was then ordered to make the ambassadors the usual presents.

SECTION III.

ANTIOCHUS'S PROCEEDINGS AGAINST THE JEWS. HIS ARMIES LOSE SEVERAL VICTORIES. IS STRUCK BY THE HAND OF GOD.

ANTIOCHUS, at his return from Egypt, exasperated to see himself forcibly dispossessed by the Romans, of a crown which he looked upon already as his own, made the Jews, though they had not offended him in any manner, feel the whole weight of his wrath. In his march through Palestine, he detached twenty two thousand men, the command of whom he gave to Apollonius, with orders to destroy the city of Jerusalem.

Apollonius arrived there just two years after this city had been taken by Antiochus. At his first coming, he did not behave, in any manner, as if he had γ A. M. 3836. Ant. J. C. 168. 1 Maccab. i. 30—40. and ii. ver. 24—27. Joseph. Antiq. l. xii. c. 7.

received such cruel orders, and waited till the first day of the sabbath before he executed them. But then, seeing all the people assembled peaceably in the synagogues, and paying their religious worship to the Creator, he put in execution the barbarous commission he had received; and, setting all his troops upon them, commanded them to cut to pieces all the men; and to seize all the women and children, in order that they might be exposed to sale. These commands were obeyed with the utmost cruelty and rigor. Not a single man was spared; all they could find being cruelly butchered, inasmuch, that every part of the city streamed with blood. The city was afterwards plundered, and fire set to several parts of it, after all the rich moveables had been carried off. They demolished such parts of the houses as were still standing; and, with the ruins, built a strong fort on the top of one of the hills of the city of David, opposite to the temple, which it commanded. They threw a strong garrison into it, to awe the whole Jewish nation; they made it a good place of arms, furnished with good magazines, where they deposited all the spoils taken in the plunder of the city.

From hence, the garrison fell on all who came to worship the true God in the temple; and shed their blood on every part of the sanctuary, which they polluted by all possible methods. A stop was put to both morning and evening sacrifices; not one of the servants of the true God daring to come and adore him there.

^z As soon as Antiochus was returned to Antioch, he published a decree, by which the several nations in his dominions were commanded to lay aside their ancient religious ceremonies, and their particular usages; to profess the same religion with the king; and, to worship the same gods, and after the same manner as he did. This decree, though expressed in general terms, glanced, nevertheless, chiefly at the Jews, whom he was absolutely determined to extirpate, as well as their religion.

In order that this edict might be punctually executed, he sent intendants into all the provinces of his empire, who were commanded to see it put in execution, and to instruct the people in all the ceremonies and customs to which they were to conform.

The Gentiles obeyed with no great reluctance. Though they seemed not to have been affected with the change of their worship, or gods; they, however, were not very well pleased with this innovation in religious matters. No people seemed more eager to comply with the orders of the court, than the Samaritans. They presented a petition to the king, in which they declared themselves not to be Jews; and desired, that their temple, built on mount Gerizim, which, till then, had not been dedicated to any deity in particular,^a might, henceforwards, be consecrated to the Grecian Jupiter, and be called after his name. Antiochus received their petition very graciously, and ordered ^z 1 Maccab. i. 41—64. and 2 Maccab. vi. 1—7. Joseph. Antiq. l. xii. c. 7.

^a They expressed themselves in that manner, because the mighty name of the God of Israel, "Jehovah," was never uttered by the Jews.

Nicanor, deputy governor of the province of Samaria, to dedicate their temple to the Grecian Jupiter, as they had desired, and not to molest them in any manner.

But the Samaritans were not the only apostates who forsook their God, and their law, in this trial. Several Jews, either to escape the persecution, to ingratiate themselves with the king or his officers, or else from inclination and libertinism, changed also their religion. From these different motives, many fell from Israel ;^b and, several of those who had once taken this wicked step, joining themselves with the king's forces, became, as is but too common, greater persecutors of their unhappy brethren, than the heathens themselves, employed to execute this barbarous commission.

The intendant, who was sent into Judea and Samaria, to see the king's decree was punctually obeyed, was called Atheneus, a man advanced in years, and extremely well versed in all the ceremonies of the Grecian idolatry ; who, for that reason, was judged a fit person to invite those nations to join in it. As soon as he arrived in Jerusalem, he began by putting a stop to the sacrifices which were offered up to the God of Israel, and suppressing all the observances of the Jewish law. They polluted the temple in such a manner, that it was no longer fit for the service of God ; profaned the sabbaths, and other festivals ; forbid the circumcision of children ; carried off and burnt all the copies of the law, wherever they could find them ; abolished all the ordinances of God, in every part of the country ; and, put to death whoever was found to have acted contrary to the decree of the king. The Syrian soldiers, and the intendant who commanded over them, were the chief instruments by which the Jews were converted to the religion professed by the sovereign.

^b 1 Maccab. vi. 21—24.

To establish it the sooner, in every part of the nation, altars and chapels, filled with idols, were erected in every part of the city, and sacred groves were planted. They set officers over these, who caused all the people in general, to offer sacrifices in them every month, the day of the month on which the king was born, who made them eat swine's flesh, and other unclean animals sacrificed there.

° One of these officers, Apelles by name, came to Modin, the residence of Mattathias, of the sacerdotal race, a venerable man, and extremely zealous for the law of God. He was son to John, and grandson to Simon, from whose father, Asmoneus, the family was called Asmoneans. With him were his five sons, all brave men, and fired with as ardent a zeal for the law of God, as himself. These were Joannan, surnamed Gaddis; Simon, surnamed Thasi; Judas, surnamed Maccabeus; Eleazar, called Abaron; and Jonathan, called Apphus. Being arrived in Modin, Apelles assembled the inhabitants, and explained to them the purport of his commission. Directing himself afterwards to Mattathias, he endeavoured to persuade him to conform to the king's orders; in hopes, that the conversion of so venerable a man would induce all the rest of the inhabitants to follow his example. He promised, that in case of his compliance, the king would rank him' in the number of his friends, and appoint him a member of his council ; and, that himself and his sons should be raised, by the court, to the greatest honours and preferments. Mattathias said, so loud as to be heard by the whole assembly, that, ^d though all the nations of the earth should obey king Antiochus, and all the people of Israel should abandon the law of their forefathers, and obey his ordinances ; yet himself, his children, and his brothers, would adhere for ever inviolably to the law of God.

° 1 Maccab. ii. 1—30. Joseph. Antiq. l. xii. c. 8.

After having made this declaration, seeing a Jew going up to the altar which the heathens had raised, to sacrifice there, in obedience to the king's injunction ; fired with a zeal like that of Phineas, and transported with a just and holy indignation,^e he fell upon the apostate, and killed him. After this, being assisted by his sons, and some others who joined them, he also killed the king's commissioner, and all his followers. Having, in a manner, thrown up the standard by this bold action, he cried aloud in the city ; ^f " Whosoever is zealous of the law,^g and maintaineth the covenants, let him follow me." As he now had assembled his whole family, and all who were truly zealous for the worship of God, he retired with them to the mountains, whither they were soon followed by others ; so that all the deserts of Judea were filled, in a little time, with people who fled from the persecution.

^d Etsi omnes gentes regi Antiocho obediunt, ut discedat unusquisque a servitute legis patrum suorum, et consentiat mandatis ejus ; ego, et filii mei, et fratres mei, obediemus legi patrum nostrorum.

^e God had commanded his people to slay those who should persuade them to sacrifice to idols. See Deut. ch. xiii. ver. 6—11.

^f Omnis, qui zelum habet legis, statuens testamentum, exeat post me.

^h At first, when the Jews were attacked on the sabbath, for fear of violating the holiness of the day, they did not dare to make the least defence; but suffered themselves to be cut to pieces. However, they soon became sensible, that the law of the sabbath was not binding to persons in such imminent danger as themselves.

ⁱ Advice being brought Antiochus, that his decrees were not so implicitly obeyed in Judea as in all other nations, went thither in person, in order to see them put in execution. He then exercised the most horrid cruelties over all such Jews as refused to abjure their religion; in order to force the rest, by the dread of the like inhuman treatment, to comply with what was required of them.^k At this time happened the martyrdom of Eleazar; of the mother and her seven sons, commonly called the Maccabees. Although their history is universally known, they appear to me so important, and relate so nearly to Antiochus, whose life I am now writing, that I cannot prevail with myself to omit it. I shall therefore repeat it in almost the very words of scripture.

The extreme violence of the persecution occasioned many to fall away; but, on the other side, several continued inflexible, and chose to suffer death rather than pollute themselves by eating impure meats.

^h 1 Maccab. ii. 31—41. 2 Maccab. vi. 11. Joseph. Antiq. l. xii. c. 8.

ⁱ A. M. 3837. Ant. J. C. 167. Joseph. de Maccab. c. iv. and v.

^k 2 Maccab. vi. and vii.

Eleazar was one of the most illustrious among these. He was a venerable old man, ninety years of age, and a doctor of the law, whose life had been one continued series of spotless innocence. He was commanded to eat swine's flesh, and endeavours were used to make him swallow it, by forcibly opening his mouth. But Eleazar, preferring a glorious death, to a criminal life, went voluntarily to execution ; and persevering in his resolute patience, was determined not to infringe the law to save his life.

His friends who were present, moved with an unjust compassion, took him aside, and earnestly besought him to permit them to bring him such meats as he was allowed to eat ; in order that it might be imagined, that he had eaten of the meats of the sacrifice, pursuant to the king's command ; and by that means save his life. But Eleazar, considering only what great age, the noble and generous sentiments he was born with, and the life of purity and innocence which he had led from his infancy, required of him, answered, pursuant to the ordinances of the holy law of God, that he would rather die than consent to what was desired from him. "It would be shameful," says he to them, "for me at this age, to use such an artifice, as many young men, upon the supposition, that Eleazar, at fourscore and ten years of age, had embraced the principles of the heathens, would be imposed upon by such deceit, which I should have employed to preserve the short remains of a corruptible life ; and thereby I should dishonour my old age, and expose it to the curses of all men. Besides, supposing I should by that means avoid the punishment of men,

I could never fly from the hand of the Almighty, neither in this world, nor in that which is to come. For this reason, if I lay down my life courageously, I shall appear worthy of old age ; and still leave behind me for the imitation of young people, an example of constancy and resolution, by suffering patiently an honourable death, for the sake of our venerable and holy laws." Eleazar had no sooner ended his speech, but he was dragged to execution. The officers who tended him, and who, hitherto, had behaved with some humanity towards him, grew furious upon what he had said, which, they looked upon as the effect of pride. When the torments had made him ready to breathe his last, he vented a deep sigh, and said, " O Lord ! thou who art possessed of the holy knowledge, thou seest that I, who could have delivered myself from death, do yet suffer cruel agonies in my body ; but in my soul find joy in my sufferings, because I fear thee." Thus died this holy man ; leaving, by his death, not only to the young men, but to his whole nation, a glorious example of virtue and resolution.

At this time, seven brothers, with their mother, were seized ; and king Antiochus would force them to eat swine's flesh, contrary to their law, by causing their bodies to be scourged in a most inhuman manner. But the eldest of the brethren said to him, " What is it thou wouldst ask or have of us ? We are ready to lay down our lives, rather than violate the holy laws which God gave to our forefathers." The king being exasperated at these words, ordered brazen pans and caldrons to be heated ; and, when they were red, he caused the tongue of that man who had spoke first to be cut off; had the skin torn from his head, and the extremities of his hands and feet cut off, before his mother and his brethren. After being mutilated in every part of his body, he was brought close to the fire, and fried in the pan. Whilst these variety of tortures were inflicting upon him, his brothers and their mother exhorted each other to die courageously, saying, "The Lord God will have regard to truth; he will have pity on us, and comfort us, as Moses declares in his song."

The first dying in this manner, the second was taken; and, after the hair of his head, with the skin, were torn away, he was asked whether he would eat of some meats which were presented to him; otherwise, that all his limbs should be severed from his body. But he answered, in the language of his country, "I will not obey any of your commands." He was then tortured in the same manner as his brother. Being ready to expire, he spoke thus to the king; "Wicked prince, you bereave us of this terrestrial life; but, the king of heaven and earth, if we die for the defence of his laws, will one day raise us up to everlasting life."

They now proceeded to the third. He was commanded to put forth his tongue, which he did immediately; and, afterwards, stretching forth his hands, with the utmost tranquillity of mind, he bravely said, "I received these limbs from heaven, but I now despise them, since I am to defend the laws of God; from the sure and steadfast hopes, that he will one day restore them to me." The king, and all his followers, were astonished at the intrepidity of this young man, who scorned the utmost efforts of their cruelty.

The fourth was tortured in the same manner ; and, being ready to die, he said to the monarch, “ It is for our advantage to be killed by men, because we hope that God will restore us to life at the resurrection ; but you, O king, will never rise to life.”

The fifth, whilst they were tormenting him, said to Antiochus, “ You now act according to your own will and pleasure, because you are invested with absolute human power, though you are but a mortal man. But, do not imagine that God has forsaken our nation. Stay but a little, and you will see the wondrous effects of his power, and in what manner he will torment yourself and your race.”

The sixth came next, who, the moment before he expired, said, “ Do not deceive yourself ; it is true, indeed, our sins have drawn upon us the exquisite tortures which we now suffer ; but, do not flatter yourself with the hopes of impunity, after having presumed to make war against God himself.”

In the mean time, their mother, supported by the hopes that she had in God, beheld, with incredible resolution, all her seven sons die thus inhumanly in one day. She encouraged them by the wisest and most pathetic discourse ; and, uniting a manly courage with the tenderness of a mother, she said to them, “ I know not in what manner you were formed in my womb ; for it was not I who inspired you with a soul, and with life, nor formed your members ; but, I am sure that the Creator of the world, who fashioned man, and who gave being to all things, will one day restore you to life, by his infinite mercy, in return for your having despised it here, out of the love you bear to his laws.”

There still remained her youngest son. Antiochus began to exhort him to a compliance; assuring him, with an oath, that he would raise him to riches and power, and rank him in the number of his favourites, if he would forsake the laws of his forefathers. But the youth being insensible to all these promises, the king called his mother, and advised her to inspire the child with salutary counsels. This she promised; and, going up to her son, and laughing at the tyrant's cruelty, she said to him, in her native language, "Son, have pity on me; on me, who bore you nine months in my womb; who, for three years, fed you with milk from my breasts, and brought you up ever since. I conjure you, dear child, to look upon heaven and earth, and every thing they contain; and, firmly to believe that God formed them all as well as man. Fear not that cruel executioner; but show yourself worthy of your brethren, by submitting cheerfully to death; in order that, by the mercy of God, I may receive you, together with your brothers, in the glory which awaits us."

As she was speaking in this manner, the young child cried aloud, "What is it you expect from me? I do not obey the king's command, but the law which was given us by Moses. As to you, from whom all the calamities with which the Hebrews have been afflicted, flow, you shall not escape the hand of the Almighty. Our sufferings, indeed, are owing to our sins; but, if the Lord our God, to punish us, was, for a little time angry with us, he at last will be appeased, and be reconciled to his servants. But, as for you, the most wicked, the most impious of men, do not flatter yourself with vain hopes. You shall not escape the judgment of the Creator, who is all seeing and omnipotent. As to my brothers, after having suffered a moment, the most cruel tortures, they taste eternal joys. In imitation of the example they have set me, I freely give up my body and life, for the laws of my forefathers; and, I beseech God to extend his mercy soon to our nation; to force you, by wounds and tortures of every kind, to confess that he is the only God; and, that his anger, which is justly fallen on the Hebrews, may end by my death, and that of my brethren.”

The king, now transported with fury, and unable to bear these insults, caused this last youth to be tortured more grievously than the rest. Thus he died in the same holy manner as his brethren, and with the utmost confidence in God. At last, the mother also suffered death.

Mattathias, before he died, sent for his five sons; and, after exhorting them to fight valiantly for the law of God, against their persecutors, he appointed Judas for their general, and Simon as president of the council. He afterwards died, and was interred at Modin, in the burying place of his ancestors, all the faithful Israelites shedding floods of tears at his death.

^m Antiochus finding that Paulus Emilius, after having defeated Perseus, and conquered Macedonia, had solemnized games in the city of Amphipolis, situated on the river Strymon, was desirous to have the same spectacle exhibited at Daphne, near Antioch. He appointed the time for them, sent to all places to invite spectators, and drew together prodigious multitudes. The games were celebrated with incredible pomp, cost immense sums, and lasted several days. The part he there acted, during the whole time, answered, in every respect, to the character given of him by Daniel,^a who calls him a vile or contemptible man, as I have said elsewhere. He there did so many mad actions before that infinite multitude of people, assembled from different parts of the earth, that he became the laughing stock of them all; and, many of them were so much disgusted, that, to prevent their being spectators of a conduct so unworthy a prince, and so repugnant to the rules of modesty and decorum, they refused to go any more to the feasts to which he invited them.

¹ A. M. 3838. Ant. J. C. 166. 1 Maccab. ii. 49—70. Joseph. Antiq. l. viii. c. 12.

^m Polyb. apud Athen. l. v. p. 193, &c. Diod. in Excerpt. Vales. p. 321.

° He had scarce ended the solemnization of these games, but Tiberius Gracchus arrived, as ambassador from the Romans, in order to have an eye on Antiochus's actions. That prince gave him so polite and friendly a reception, that the ambassador not only laid aside all suspicion with regard to him, and did not perceive that he retained any resentment with respect to what had happened in Alexandria; but, even blamed those who spread such reports of him. And, indeed, Antiochus, beside other civilities, quitted his palace to make room for Tiberius Gracchus, and his train; and, was even going to resign his crown to him. The ambassador ought to have been politician enough to suspect all these caresses ; for, it is certain that Antiochus was meditating, at that time, how he might best revenge himself of the Romans ; but he disguised his sentiments, in order to gain time, and to be the better able to carry on his preparations.

^a Dan. xi. 21.

° Polyb. Leg. 101—104. Diod. in Excerpt. Vales. p. 322.

^p Whilst Antiochus was amusing himself with celebrating games at Daphne, Judas was acting a very different part in Judea. After having levied an army, he fortified the cities, rebuilt the fortresses, threw strong garrisons into them, and thereby awed the whole country. Apollonius, who was governor of Samaria, under Antiochus, thought he should be able to check his progress ; and, accordingly, marched directly against him. However, Judas defeated him, and made a great slaughter of his troops. Seron, another commander, who had flattered himself with the hopes of revenging the affront his master had received, met with the like fate ; and, as that general had been, was also defeated and killed in the battle.

When news was brought to Antiochus of this double defeat, he was exasperated to fury. Immediately, he assembled all his troops, which formed a mighty army, and determined to destroy the whole Jewish nation, and to settle other people in their country. But, when his troops were to be paid, he had not sufficient sums in his coffers, having exhausted them in the foolish expenses he had lately been at. For want of money, he was obliged to suspend the vengeance he meditated against the Jewish nation, and all the plans he had formed for the immediate execution of that design.

^p 1 Maccab. iii. 1—26. 2 Maccab. viii. 5—7. Joseph. Antiq. l. xii. c. 19

¶ He had squandered immense sums on the games. Besides this, he had been extravagantly profuse in every other respect; particularly, in the presents he bestowed on particular persons, and whole bodies of men. He would often throw his money abundantly among his attendants, and others; sometimes seasonably enough, but most frequently without sense or reason. On these occasions, he verified what the prophet Daniel had foretold of him, that he should “scatter among them the prey and spoil of riches;” and, the author of the Maccabees^a says, that he had been exceedingly liberal, and had “abounded above the kings that were before him.” We are told by Atheneus,^b that the circumstances which enabled him to defray so prodigious an expense, were, first, the spoils he had taken in Egypt, contrary to the promise he had made Philometor in his minority; secondly, the sums he had raised among his friends, by way of free gifts; lastly, which was the most considerable article, the plunder of a great number of temples, which he had sacrilegiously invaded.

¶ Besides the difficulties to which the want of money reduced him, others arose, according to Daniel’s prophecy, from the “tidings” which came to him “out of the east, and out of the north;” for, northward, Artaxias, king of Armenia, had rebelled against him; and Persia, which lay eastward, discontinued the regular payment of the tribute. ¶ There, as in every other

^a Joseph. Antiq. l. xii. c. 11.

^b Dan. xi. 24.

^c 1 Maccab. iii. 30.

^d Athen. l. v. p. 195.

^e Dan. xi. 44. et Hieron. in hunc locum.

^f 1 Maccab. iii. 29.

part of his dominions, all things seemed in the utmost confusion, occasioned by the new ordinance by which the ancient customs of so many of his subjects were abolished, and those of the Greeks, of which he was ridiculously fond, established in their stead. These things occasioned great confusion with respect to the payments, which, till then, had been very regular throughout that vast and rich empire, and had always supplied sums sufficient to defray the great expenses it was necessary to be at.

^w To remedy these grievances, as well as a multitude of others, he resolved to divide his forces into two parts; to give the command of one of his armies to Lysias, descended from the blood royal, in order that he might subdue the Jews; and, to march the other into Armenia, and afterwards into Persia, to reinstate the affairs of those provinces in their former flourishing condition. He accordingly left Lysias the government of all the countries on this side the Euphrates; and the care of his son's education, who afterwards was called Antiochus Eupator.* After passing mount Taurus, he entered Armenia, beat Artaxias, and took him prisoner. He marched from thence into Persia, where he supposed he should have no other trouble, but to receive the tribute of that rich province, and those in its neighbourhood. He fondly flattered himself, that he should there find sums sufficient to fill his coffers, and reinstate all his affairs upon as good a footing as ever.

^w 1 Maccab. iii. 31—60. and iv. 1—25. 2 Maccab. viii. 8—28. Joseph Antiq. l. xii. c. 11. Appian in Syr. p. 117. Hieron. in Dan. xi. 44.

* He was then but seven years old.

Whilst he was forming all these projects, Lysias was meditating how he might best put in execution the orders he had left him, especially those which related to the Jews. The king had commanded him to extirpate them, so as not to leave one Hebrew in the country; which he intended to people with other inhabitants, and to distribute the lands among them by lot. He thought it necessary for him to make the more despatch in this expedition, because advice was daily brought him, that the arms of Judas made prodigious progress, and increased in strength, by taking all the fortresses which he approached.

Philip, whom Antiochus had left governor of Judea, seeing Judas's success, had sent expresses, with advice of this to Ptolemy Macron, governor of Celosyria and Palestine, on which Judea depended, and had pressed him, by letter, to employ such measures as might best support the interests of their common sovereign, in this important conjuncture. Macron had communicated his advices and letters to Lysias. A resolution was therefore immediately taken, to send an army, of which Ptolemy Macron was appointed generalissimo, into Judea. He appointed Nicanor, his intimate friend, his lieutenant general; sent him before, at the head of twenty thousand men, with Gorgias, a veteran officer of consummate experience, to assist him. Accordingly they entered the country, and were soon followed by Ptolemy, with the rest of the forces intended for that expedition. The armies, when joined, came and encamped at Emmaus, near Jerusalem. It consisted of forty thousand foot, and seven thousand horse.

Thither also repaired an army of another kind. It consisted of merchants, who came to purchase the slaves, who, it was supposed, would certainly be taken in that war. Nicanor, who had flattered himself with the hopes of levying large sums of money by this means, sufficient to pay the two thousand talents,⁷ which the king still owed the Romans, on account of the ancient treaty of Sipylus, published a proclamation in the neighbouring countries, declaring, that all the prisoners taken in that war, should be sold, at the rate of ninety for a talent.⁸ A resolution, indeed, had been taken to cut to pieces all the men grown; to reduce all the rest to a state of captivity; and one hundred and eighty thousand of the latter, at the price above mentioned, would have sold exactly for the sum in question. The merchants, therefore, finding this would be a very profitable article to them, as it was a very low price, flocked thither in crowds, and brought considerable sums with them. We are told that one thousand, all of them very considerable merchants, arrived in the Syrian camp on this occasion, without including their domestics, and the persons they should want, to look after the captives they intended to purchase.

Judas and his brethren, perceiving the danger with which they were threatened by the approach of so powerful an army, which they knew had been commanded to extirpate entirely the Jewish nation, resolved to make a very vigorous defence; to fight for themselves, their law, and their liberty; and, either to conquer or die sword in hand. Accordingly, they divided the six thousand men under their command, into four bodies of fifteen hundred men each. Judas put himself at the head of the first, and gave the command of the three others to his brethren. He afterwards marched them to Maspha, there to offer together their prayers to God, and to implore his assistance in the extreme danger to which they were reduced. He made choice of this place, because, as Jerusalem was in the hands of their enemies, and the sanctuary trampled upon, they could not assemble in it to solemnize that religious act; and Maspha seemed the fittest place for that purpose, because God was worshipped there before the foundation of the temple.

⁷ About three hundred thousand pounds sterling.

⁸ One thousand crowns.

^a Here are now two armies ready to engage, the numbers on each side very unequal, and the disposition of their minds still more so. ^b They agree, however, in one point; that is, both are firmly persuaded they shall gain the victory; the one, because they have a mighty army of well disciplined troops, commanded by brave and experienced generals; the other, because they put their whole trust in the God of armies.

After proclamation had been made, according to the ^c law, that those who had built a house that year, or married a wife, or planted a vine, or were afraid, had liberty to retire; Judas's six thousand men were reduced to half that number. Nevertheless, this valiant captain of the people of God, resolutely determined to fight the mighty host of the enemy, with only this handful of men, and to leave the issue to Providence ; advanced with his few forces, encamped very near the enemy, and told his soldiers, after having animated them by all the motives which the present conjuncture supplied, that he intended to give the Syrians battle on the morrow, and, therefore, that they must prepare for it.

^a Judges xx. 1.

^b 1 Reg. vii. 5.

^c Deut. xx. 5, &c.

But, receiving advice that same evening, that Gorgias had been detached from the enemy's camp, with five thousand foot and one thousand horse, all chosen troops ; and, that he was marching a by way, through which the apostate Jews led him, in order to come and surprise his camp in the night ; he was not satisfied with frustrating that design, but even made use of the very stratagem which the enemy intended to employ against him, and was successful in it ; for, raising his camp immediately, and carrying off all the baggage, he marched, and attacked the enemy's camp, weakened by the best troops having been detached from it, and spread such terror and confusion into every part of it, that, after three thousand Syrians had been cut to pieces, the rest fled, and left him the whole plunder of their camp.

As Gorgias was still at the head of his formidable detachment, Judas, like a wise captain, kept his troops together, and would not suffer them to straggle about after plunder, or in pursuit of the enemy, till they should have defeated that body also. He was successful, without coming to a battle ; for, Gorgias, after failing to meet with Judas in his camp, and having sought for him in vain in the mountains, whither he supposed he had retired, withdrew, at last, into his camp ; and, finding it in a blaze, and his soldiers straggling and flying away, it was impossible for him to keep them in order ; so that these threw down their arms, and fled also. Then Judas, and the men under his command, pursued them vigorously, and cut to pieces a greater number, on this occasion, than they had before done in the camp. Nine thousand Syrians were left dead in the field, and the greatest part of those who fled, were either maimed or wounded.

After this, Judas marched back his soldiers, in order to plunder the camp, where they met with immense booty ; and, great numbers who were come, as to a fair, to buy the captive Jews, were themselves taken prisoners and sold. The next day, being the sabbath, was solemnized in the most religious manner. The Hebrews, on that occasion, gave themselves up to an holy joy, and unanimously returned thanks to the Creator, for the great and signal deliverance he had wrought in their favour.

We have here a sensible image of the feeble opposition which the human arm is able to make against that of the Almighty, on whom only the fate of battles depends. It is evident, that Judas was fully sensible of his own weakness. "How can we," says he to the Almighty, before the battle, "stand before them, unless thou thyself assistest us?" And it is as evident, that he was no less firmly persuaded of the success of his arms. "The victory," he had said before, "does not depend on the number of soldiers, but it is from heaven that all our strength comes." But, although Judas had so entire a confidence in God, he employs all those expedients which the most experienced and bravest general could use, in order to obtain the victory. How excellent a pattern have we here for generals ! To pray with humility, because all things depend on God ; and, to act with vigor, as if all things depended on man. We are still possessed, thanks to the Almighty, of generals, who believe it glorious to entertain such thoughts ; and who, at the head of great armies, composed of as brave soldiers as ever were, as well as of officers and commanders of an almost unparalleled courage and zeal, do not rely on all those human advantages, but solely on the protection of the God of armies.

^d Judas, encouraged by the important victory he had gained, and reinforced by a great number of troops, whom this success brought to him, employed the advantage which this gave him, to distress the rest of his enemies. Knowing that Timotheus and Bacchides, two of Antiochus's lieutenants, were raising troops to fight him, he marched against them, defeated them in a great battle, and killed upwards of twenty thousand of their men.

^e Lysias, hearing of the ill success which Antiochus's arms had met with in Judea, and the great losses he had sustained in that country, was in great astonishment and perplexity. However, knowing that the king had a strong desire to extirpate that nation, he made mighty preparations for a new expedition against the Jews. Accordingly, he levied an army of sixty thousand foot, and five thousand horse, all chosen troops ; and, putting himself at their head, he marched into Judea, firmly resolved to lay waste the whole country, and to destroy all the inhabitants.

^d 2 Maccab. viii. 50—53.

^e A. M. 3839. Ant. J. C. 165. 1 Maccab. iv. 26—35. Joseph. Antiq. l. xii. c. 11.

He encamped at Bethsura, a city standing to the south of Jerusalem, towards the frontiers of Idumea. Judas advanced towards him at the head of ten thousand men ; and, fully persuaded that the Lord would assist him, he engaged the enemy with his inconsiderable body of troops, killed five thousand of them, and put the rest to flight. Lysias, dismayed at the surprising valor of Judas's soldiers, who fought with intrepid courage, determined to conquer or die, led back his conquered army to Antioch ; intending, nevertheless, to come and attack them again the next year, with a still more powerful body of forces.

† Judas, being left master of the field, by the retreat of Lysias, took advantage of this opportunity, and marched to Jerusalem, where he recovered the sanctuary from the heathens, purified and dedicated it again to the service of God. This solemn dedication continued a week, all which was spent in thanksgiving, for the delivery which God had vouchsafed them ; and, it was ordained, that the anniversary of it should be solemnized every year. The neighbouring nations, jealous of the prosperity of the Jews, made a league to destroy them ; and, resolved to join Antiochus, in order to extirpate that people.

‡ This prince was then in Persia, levying the tribute which had not been paid regularly. He was informed, that Elymais was thought to abound with riches ; and, especially, that in a temple of that city, which, Polybius says, was dedicated to Diana, and to Venus, according to Appian, prodigious sums were laid up. He went thither with a design to take the city, and plunder the temple, as he had before done Jerusalem ; but, his design having taken vent, the country people, and the inhabitants of the city, took up arms to defend their temple, and gave him a shameful repulse. Antiochus, thunderstruck at this disgrace, withdrew to Ecbatana.

† 1 Maccab. iv. 36—61. et. v. 1, 2. 2 Maccab. x. 1—8. Joseph. Antiq. l. xii. c. 11.

‡ A. M. 3840. Ant. J. C. 164. 1 Maccab. vi. 1—16. 2 Maccab. ix. 1—29. Polyb. in Excerpt. Vales. p. 145. Appian. in Syr. p. 151.

To add to his affliction, news was there brought him of the defeat of Nicanor and Timotheus, in Judea. In the violence of his rage, he set out, with all possible expedition, in order to make that nation feel the dreadful effects of his wrath ; venting nothing but menaces on his march, and breathing only final ruin and destruction. Advancing in this disposition towards Babylonia, which was in his way, fresh expresses came to him, with advice of Lysias's defeat ; and, also, that the Jews had retaken the temple, thrown down the altars and idols which he had set up in them, and reestablished their ancient worship. At this news his fury increased. Immediately, he commands his coachman to drive with the utmost speed, in order that he might have an opportunity to satiate fully his vengeance ; threatening to make Jerusalem the burying place of the whole Jewish nation, and not to leave one single inhabitant in it. He had scarce uttered that blasphemous expression, but he was struck by the hand of God. He was seized with incredible pains in his bowels, and the most excessive pangs of the cholic.

“Thus the murderer and blasphemer,” says the author of the Maccabees, “having suffered most grievously, as he treated other men, so died he a miserable death, in a strange country, in the mountain.”

But still, his pride was not abated by this first shock ; so far from it, that, suffering himself to be hurried away by the wild transports of his fury, and breathing nothing but vengeance against the Jews, he gave orders for proceeding with all possible speed in the journey. But, as his horses were running forwards impetuously, he fell from his chariot, and thereby bruised, in a grievous manner, every part of his body ; so that his attendants were forced to put him into a litter, where he suffered inexpressible torments. Worms crawled from every part of him ; his flesh fell away piecemeal ; and, the stench was so great, that it became intolerable to the whole army. Being himself unable to bear it ;^b “It is meet,” says he, “to be subject unto God ; and man, who is mortal, should not think of himself, as if he were a god.” Acknowledging that it was the hand of the Lord of Israel which struck him, because of the calamities he had brought upon Jerusalem, he promises to exert his utmost liberality towards his chosen people ; to enrich, with precious gifts, the holy temple of Jerusalem, which he had plundered ; to furnish, from his revenues, the sums necessary for defraying the expense of the sacrifices ; to turn Jew himself ; and, to travel into every part of the world, in order to publish the power of the Almighty. He hoped he should calm his wrath by these mighty promises, which the violence of his present affliction, and the fear of future torments, extorted from his mouth, but not from his heart. "But," adds the author in question,ⁱ "this wicked person vowed unto the Lord, who now no more would have mercy upon him." And, indeed, this murderer and blasphemer, these are the names which the writer of the Maccabees substituted in the place of illustrious, which men had bestowed on that prince, being struck in a dreadful manner, and treated as he treated others, finished an impious life by a miserable death.^k

^b 2 Maccab. ix., 12.

Before he expired, he sent for Philip, who had been brought up with him from his infancy; was his favourite, and had bestowed on him the regency of Syria, during the minority of his son, then nine years of age. He had put into his hands the diadem, the seal of the empire, and all the other ensigns of royalty; exhorting him, especially, to employ his utmost endeavours to give him such an education as would best teach him the art of reigning, and how to govern his subjects with justice and moderation. Few princes give such instructions to their children, till they are near their end; and that, after having set them a quite different example during their whole lives. Philip caused the king's body to be conveyed to Antioch. This prince had sat eleven years on the throne.

ⁱ 2 Maccab. c. 13.

^k Polybius attests the truth of this, and relates, that Antiochus was troubled with a perpetual delirium; imagining that spectres stood perpetually before him, reproaching him with his crimes. This historian, who was unacquainted with the scriptures, assigns, as the cause of this punishment, the sacrilegious attempt, formed by this prince against the temple of Diana, in Elymais. Polyb. in Excerpt. Vales. p. 145.

SECTION IV.

PROPHECIES OF DANIEL RELATING TO ANTIOCHUS EPIPHANES.

As Antiochus Epiphanes was a violent persecutor of the people of God, who formed the Jewish church ; and was, at the same time, the type of the antichrist, who, in after ages, was to afflict the christian church ; the prophecies of Daniel expatiate much more on this prince, than on any other mentioned in them. This prophecy consists of two parts ; one of which relates to his wars in Egypt, and the other to the persecution carried on by him against the Jews. We shall treat these separately, and unite together the various places where mention is made of them.

1. The wars of Antiochus Epiphanes against Egypt, foretold by Daniel the prophet.

¹ “And in his,” Seleucus Philopator’s, “estate, shall stand up a vile person, to whom they shall not give the honour of the kingdom ; but, he shall come in peaceably, and obtain the kingdom by flatteries.” This verse, which points out the accession of Antiochus to the crown, has been already explained.

^m “And with the arms of a flood shall they,” the Syrians, “be overflown before him,” Antiochus Epiphanes, “and shall be broken ; yea, also, the prince of the covenant.” Heliodorus, the murderer of Seleucus, and his adherents, as also those of the Egyptian king, who had formed designs against Syria, were defeated by the forces of Attalus and Eumenes, and dispersed by the arrival of Antiochus, whose presence disconcerted all their projects. By the "prince of the covenant," we may suppose to be meant, either Heliodorus, the ringleader of the conspirators, who had killed Seleucus; or rather, Ptolemy Epiphanes, king of Egypt, who lost his life by a conspiracy of his own subjects, when he was meditating a war against Syria. Thus, Providence removed this powerful adversary, to make way for Antiochus, and raise him to the throne.

¹ Dan. xi. 21.

^m Ver. 22.

It appears that the prophet, in the following verses, points out, clearly enough, the four different expeditions of Antiochus into Egypt.

Antiochus's first expedition into Egypt.

"And after the league made with him," with Ptolemy Philometor, his nephew, king of Egypt, "he shall work deceitfully; for, he shall come up, and shall become strong with a small people." Antiochus, though he was already determined on the war; "he yet shall assume a specious appearance of friendship for the king of Egypt." He even sent Apollonius to Memphis, to be present at the banquet given on occasion of that prince's coronation, as a proof that it was agreeable to him. Nevertheless, soon after, on pretence of defending his nephew, he marched into Egypt, with a "small army" in comparison of those which he levied afterwards. The battle was fought near Pelusium. Antiochus "was

ⁿ Dan. xi. 23.

strongest," that is victorious, and afterwards returned to Tyre. Such was the end of his first expedition.

Antiochus's second expedition into Egypt.

• "He shall enter peaceably even upon the fattest places of the province," Egypt; "and he shall do that which his fathers have not done, nor his fathers' fathers; he shall scatter among them," his troops, "the prey; and spoil, and riches; yea, and he shall forecast his devices against the strong holds, even for a time.

ρ "And he shall stir up his power and his courage against the king of the south," of Egypt, "with a great army; and, the king of the south shall be stirred up to battle, with a very great and mighty army, but he shall not stand; for, they shall forecast devices against him.

¶ "Yea; they that feed of the portion of his," the king of Egypt's, "meat, shall destroy him, and his army shall overflow; and, many shall fall down slain."

In these three verses appear the principal characters of Antiochus's second expedition into Egypt; his mighty armies, his rapid conquests, the rich spoils he carried from thence, and the dissimulation and treachery he began to practise with regard to Ptolemy.

Antiochus, after employing the whole winter in making preparations for a second expedition into Egypt, invaded it both by sea and land, the instant the season would permit. "Wherefore he entered into Egypt

◦ Dan. xi. 24.

ρ Ver. 25.

¶ Ver. 26.

with a great multitude, with chariots, and elephants, and horsemen, and a great navy. And made war against Ptolemy king of Egypt; but, Ptolemy was afraid of him, and fled; and, many were wounded to death. Thus they got the strong cities in the land of Egypt, and he took the spoils thereof."

Daniel, some verses after, is more minute in his prophecy of this event.

* "And at the time of the end shall the king of the south push at him," Ptolemy is here hinted at; "and the king of the north," Antiochus, "shall come against him like a whirlwind, with chariots, and with horsemen, and with many ships, and he shall enter into the countries, and shall overflow, and pass over.

† "He shall enter also into the glorious land, and many countries shall be overthrown; but these shall escape out of his hand, even Edom and Moab, and the chief of the children of Ammon.

‡ "He shall stretch forth his hand also upon the countries, and the land of Egypt shall not escape.

§ "But he shall have power over the treasures of gold and silver, and over the precious things of Egypt," &c.

If we compare the relation given by the author of the Maccabees with Daniel's prophecy, we find a perfect resemblance, except that the prophet is more clear and particular than the historian.

¶ Diodorus relates, that Antiochus, after this victory, conquered all Egypt, or at least the greatest part of it; for, all the cities, Alexandria excepted,

* Dan. xi. 40.

† Ver. 41.

‡ Ver. 42.

§ Ver. 43.

¶ In Excerpt. Vales. p. 310.

opened their gates to the conqueror. He subdued Egypt, with an astonishing rapidity, and did that, * “ which his forefathers had not done, nor his fathers’ fathers.”

Ptolemy either surrendered himself, or fell into the hands of Antiochus, who, at first, treated him with kindness; had but one table with him, seemed to be greatly concerned for his welfare, and left him the peaceable possession of his kingdom, reserving to himself Pelusium, which was the key of it. For, Antiochus assumed this appearance of friendship with no other view but to have the better opportunity of ruining him. † “ They that feed of the portion of his meat shall destroy him.”

Antiochus did not make a long stay in Egypt at that time; the news which was brought of the general revolt of the Jews, obliging him to march against them.

In the mean time, the inhabitants of Alexandria, offended at Philometor, for having concluded an alliance with Antiochus, raised Evergetes, his younger brother, to the throne in his stead.

Antiochus, who had advice of what had passed in Alexandria, took this opportunity to return into Egypt, upon pretext of restoring the dethroned monarch, but, in reality, to make himself absolute master of the kingdom.

Antiochus's third expedition into Egypt.

‡ “ And both these kings’ hearts shall be to do mischief; and they shall speak lies at one table; but, it shall not prosper ; for yet, the end shall be at the time appointed.

* Dan. xi. 24.

† Ver. 26.

‡ Ver. 27.

^a “ Then shall he,” Antiochus, “ return into his land with great riches.”

Antiochus’s third expedition could scarce be pointed out more clearly. That prince, hearing that the Alexandrians had raised Evergetes to the throne, returned to Egypt, upon the specious pretence of restoring Philometor ; ^b Per honestam speciem majoris Ptolomæi reducendi in regnum. After having overcome the Alexandrians in a sea fight at Pelusium, he laid siege to Alexandria ; but, finding the inhabitants made a strong opposition, he was contented with making himself master of Egypt again, in the name of his nephew, in whose defence he pretended to have drawn the sword ; ^c Cui regnum quæri suis viribus simulabat. They were then at Memphis, ate at the same table, and behaved towards one another with all the outward marks of a sincere friendship. The uncle seemed to have his nephew’s interest at heart, and the nephew to repose the highest confidence in his uncle ; but, all this was mere show and outside, both dissembling their real sentiments. The uncle endeavoured to crush his nephew ; ^d Cui regnum quæri suis viribus simulabat, ut mox victorem aggrediretur ; and, the nephew, who saw through his design, voluntatis ejus non ignarus, strove immediately to be reconciled to his brother. Thus, neither succeeded in deceiving of the other ; nothing was yet determined, and Antiochus returned into Syria.

^a Dan xi. 28.

^b Liv. l. xlv. n. 19.

^c Liv. l. xlv. n. 11. Hieron. in Dan.

^d Liv. ibid.

Antiochus's fourth expedition into Egypt.

° “ At the time appointed he shall return, and come toward the south, but it shall not be as the former, or as the latter.

† “ For the ships of Chittim shall come against him ; therefore he shall be grieved, and return, and have indignation against the holy covenant.”

Advice being brought Antiochus, that the two brothers were reconciled, he threw off the mask, and declared publicly, that he intended to conquer Egypt for himself ; and, to support his pretensions, “ he returned towards the south,” that is, into Egypt, but was not so successful in this expedition as before.

‡ As he was advancing forward to besiege Alexandria, Popilius, and the other Roman ambassadors, who were on board a fleet composed of Macedonian or Greek ships, for this the Hebrew word Chittim signifies, which they found at Delos, obliged him to lay down his arms, and leave Egypt. He obeyed, but “ with the utmost reluctance, and made the city and temple of Jerusalem feel the dire effects of his indignation,” as will be presently seen.

Had the prophet been eye witness to this event, would it have been possible for him to point it out in a clearer and more exact manner ?

° Dan. xi. 29.

† Ver. 30.

‡ Liv. l. xlv. n. 10.

II. Cruel persecutions exercised by Antiochus against the Jews, and foretold by the prophet Daniel.

I have mentioned and explained, in another place, the account which Daniel the prophet gives of Alexander the Great's reign, and those of his four successors.

^b "Behold, an he goat came from the west, on the face of the whole earth, and touched not the ground." Could it have been possible to denote more plainly the rapidity of Alexander's conquests? ⁱ "The he goat waxed very great, and when he was strong, the great horn was broken; and for it came up four notable ones towards the four winds of heaven." These are Alexander's four successors. ^k "And out of one of them came forth a little horn, which waxed exceeding great, toward the south, and toward the east, and toward the pleasant land." This is Antiochus Epiphanes, who gained several victories towards the south and the east, and who strongly opposed the army of the Lord and the Jewish people, of whom God was the strength and the protector.

The prophet afterwards points out the war which Epiphanes proclaimed against the people of God, the priests of the Lord, his laws and his temple.

^l "And it waxed great," the horn, "even to the host of heaven, and it cast down some of the host, and of the stars to the ground, and stamped upon them. ^m Yea, he magnified himself even to the prince of the host," to God; "and by him the daily sacrifice was

^b Dan. viii. 5.

ⁱ Ver. 8.

^k Ver. 9.

^l Ver. 10.

^m Ver. 11.

taken away, and the place of his sanctuary was cast down. ⁿ And an host was given him against the daily sacrifice, by reason of transgression, and it cast down the truth to the ground, and it practised and prospered.”

Daniel gives still greater extent to the same prophecy, in his eleventh chapter.

o “ His heart shall be against the holy covenant ; and he shall do exploits. He shall return, and have indignation against the holy covenant.”

^p During the siege of Alexandria, a report had prevailed that Antiochus was dead, and the Jews had been accused of expressing great joy at it. He thereupon marched to their city, stormed it, and exercised all the barbarity that his fury could suggest. About forty thousand men ^q were killed, and the same number sold as slaves, in the compass of three days. Antiochus went into the temple, polluted it, and carried off all the vessels, treasures, and rich ornaments.

^r After Popilius had forced him to leave Egypt, he turned the fury he conceived upon that occasion against the Jews. He sent Apollonius into Judea, with orders to kill all the men capable of bearing arms, and to sell the women and children. Accordingly, Apollonius made dreadful havoc in Jerusalem, set fire to the city, beat down the walls, and carried the women and children into captivity.

ⁿ Dan. viii. 12.

o Dan xi. 28—30.

^p 1 Maccab. i. 21—24. and ii. 5—21. Joseph. Lib. de Maccab. &c.

^q We are told in the Maccabees, that it was twice this number.

^r 1 Maccab. i. 30—34. and ii. 24—26.

^s “ He shall return, and have intelligence with them that forsake the holy covenant. And arms shall stand on his part, and they shall pollute the sanctuary of strength, and shall take away the daily sacrifice, and they shall place the abomination that maketh desolate. And such as do wickedly against the covenant, shall be corrupt by flatteries,” &c.

^t Antiochus declared openly for all those who should renounce the law. Having published an ordinance, by which all the Jews in general, were commanded, upon pain of death, to change their religion, he sent some officers to Jerusalem, ordering them to pollute the temple, and abolish the worship of the Most High. They accordingly dedicated this temple to Jupiter Olympius, and placed his statue in it. They raised, in every part of the city, profane temples and altars, where they forced the Jews to offer sacrifices, and eat of meat sacrificed to idols. Many, from the dread of the torture, seemed to comply, in all things required from them; and even prompted others to countenance their base apostacy.

^u “ And such as do wickedly against the covenant, shall” Antiochus “ corrupt by flatteries; but, the people that do know their God, shall be strong, and do exploits.” This manifestly points at old Eleazar, the seven Maccabees, and their mother, and a great number of other Jews, who courageously opposed the impious orders of the king.

^s Dan. xi. 30, 31, 32.

^t 1 Maccab. .i xliii. &c. 2 Maccab. iv. 7, &c. vi. 1, &c.

^u Dan. xi. 32.

^v “And they that understand, among the people, shall instruct many ; yet, they shall fall by the sword, and by flame, by captivity, and by spoil, many days.” This relates chiefly to Mattathias and his sons.

^w “ Now when they shall fall, they shall be holpen with a little help ; but many shall cleave to them with flatteries.” Mattathias and Judas Maccabeus supported the distressed nation, and the almost universally abandoned religion, with so small a number of forces, that we can consider the success which the Almighty gave their arms, no otherwise than as a miracle. Their troops grew more numerous by degrees, and afterwards formed a very considerable body.

^x “And some of them of understanding shall fall, to try them, and to purge, and to make them white, even to the time of the end ; because it is yet for a time appointed.” The sufferings and death of those, who steadfastly refused to obey the king’s decree, was their glory and triumph.

^y “ And the king shall do according to his will, and he shall exalt himself, and magnify himself above every god, and shall speak marvellous things against the God of gods, and shall prosper till the indignation be accomplished ; for that that is determined, shall be done.

^z “ Neither shall he regard the God of his fathers, nor the desire of women, nor regard any god ; for, he shall magnify himself above all.”

Epiphanes ridiculed all religions. He plundered the temples of Greece, and wanted to rob that of ^v Dan. xi. 33.

^w Ver. 34.

^x Ver. 35.

^y Ver. 36.

^z Ver. 37.

Elymais. He exercised his impious fury chiefly against Jerusalem and the Jews, and almost without any resistance. The Almighty seemed to wink, for a time, at all the abominations which were committed in his temple, till his wrath against his people was satisfied.

^a “But tidings out of the east, and out of the north, shall trouble him; therefore, he shall go forth with great fury to destroy, and utterly to make away many.”

Antiochus was troubled when news was brought him, that the provinces of the east, and Artaxias, king of Armenia, to the north, were in arms, and going to throw off his yoke. Tacitus^b tells us, that when Antiochus had formed a resolution to force the Jews to change their religion, and embrace that of the Greeks, the Parthians had revolted from Antiochus. ^c Before he set out for the provinces on the other side of the Euphrates, he gave Lysias, whom he appointed regent of the kingdom, in his absence, half his army; commanding him to extirpate all the Jews, and to settle other nations in their country.

^d “He shall plant the tabernacles of his palace,” ^e in Apadno, “between the seas in the glorious holy mountain” of Zabi; “yet he shall come to his end, and none shall help him.” This verse, which is trans-

^a Dan. xi. 44.

^b Antiochus demere superstitionem, et mores Græcorum dare adnixus, quominus teterrimam gentem in melius mutaret, Parthorum bello prohibitus est; nam ea tempestate Arsaces defecerat. Tacit. l. v. c. 8.

^c 1 Maccab. iii. 31—39.

^d Dan. xi. 45.

^e N. B. The words not quoted in this verse, are not in our English translation of the bible.

lated literally from the Hebrew, is very difficult to be explained, because of the two words Apadno and Zabi, which are not to be found in the ancient geography. The reader knows that I do not take upon me to clear up these kind of difficulties. Porphyry, whom we have no reason to suspect, imagined, that this verse alluded to Antiochus's expedition beyond the Euphrates; and, to his death, which happened on that march. This is the opinion of the greatest part of the interpreters; and, therefore, we ought to be satisfied with it.

The prophet, therefore, declares, that Antiochus shall pitch his camp near mount Zabi, doubtless the same with ^fTaba; where, according to Polybius,^g he died; and, that there he "shall come to his end," being abandoned by God, and having none to "help him." We have seen how he expired in the most cruel agonies, and struck with an unavailing repentance, which only increased his torments.

Theodoret, St. Jerom, and several interpreters, take all that the prophet Daniel speaks concerning Antiochus Epiphanes, in another sense, as alluding to anti-christ. It is certain, that this prince, who was equally impious and cruel, is one of the most sensible, as well as most expressive types of that enemy of Christ Jesus, and our holy religion.

It is impossible for us, whilst we are reading this prophecy, not to be prodigiously struck, to see the justness and accuracy, with which the prophet traces ^f Taba, according to Polybius, was in Persia; and in Paretacena, according to Quintius Curtius.

^g Polyb. in Excerpt. Vales. p. 145.

the principal characteristics of a king, whose history is so much blended with that of the Jews ; and, we perceive evidently, that, for this reason, the holy spirit, either entirely omitting, or taking only a transient notice of the actions of other much more famous princes, dwells so long on that of Antiochus Epiphanes.

With what certainty does Daniel foretel a multitude of events, so very remote, and which depended on so many arbitrary circumstances ! How manifestly did the spirit, which presented futurity to his view, show it him as present, and in as clear a light, as if he had seen it with his bodily eyes ! Do not the divine authority of the scriptures, and, by a necessary consequence, the certainty of the christian religion, become, by such proofs, in a manner, palpable, and self evident ?

No prophecy was ever fulfilled in so clear, so perfect, and so indisputable a manner, as this. Porphyry,^b the professed enemy of the christian religion, as well as of the Old and New Testament, being infinitely perplexed in finding so great a conformity between the events foretold by Daniel, and the relations given by the best historians, did not pretend to deny this conformity, for that would have been repugnant to sense, and denying the shining of the sun at noon-day. However, he took another course, in order to undermine the authority of the scriptures. He himself laboured, by citing all the historians extant at that time, and which are since lost, to show, in a very extensive manner, that whatever is written in the eleventh chapter of Daniel, happened exactly as foretold by that prophet ; and, he concluded, from this perfect uniformity, that so exact a detail of so great a number of events, could not possibly have been written by Daniel, so many years before they happened ; and, that this work must certainly have been written by some person who lived after Antiochus Epiphanes, and borrowed Daniel's name.

^b Porphyry was a learned heathen, born at Tyre, A. D. 233, and wrote a very voluminous treatise against the christian religion.

In this contest between the christians and heathens, the former would indisputably carry their cause, could they be able to demonstrate, by good proofs, that Daniel's prophecies were really written by him. Now, this they proved unanswerably, by citing the testimony of a whole people, I mean the Jews, whose evidence could not be suspected or disallowed, as they were still greater enemies to the christian religion than the heathens themselves. The reverence they had for the sacred writings, of which Providence had appointed them the depositaries and guardians, was so prodigious, that they would have thought him a criminal and sacrilegious wretch, who should have attempted only to transpose a single word, or change one letter in it. What idea then, would they have entertained of that man, who should pretend to introduce any supposititious books in them ? Such are the witnesses who attested the reality of Daniel's prophecies. And were ever proofs so convincing, or cause so victorious ?
: " Thy testimonies are very sure ; O Lord, for ever."

ⁱ Psal. xciii. 5.

The first part of the book is devoted to a general history of the United States, from the discovery of the continent to the present time. The second part is a history of the individual states, and the third part is a history of the federal government.

The first part of the book is divided into three volumes. The first volume contains the history of the discovery of the continent, and the second volume contains the history of the settlement of the continent. The third volume contains the history of the federal government, from the adoption of the Constitution to the present time.

The second part of the book is divided into two volumes. The first volume contains the history of the individual states, and the second volume contains the history of the federal government.

The third part of the book is a history of the federal government, from the adoption of the Constitution to the present time.

BOOK NINETEENTH.

THE HISTORY OF ALEXANDER'S SUCCESSORS,
CONTINUED.

ARTICLE I.

THIS article contains eleven years, being the whole reign of Perseus, the last king of Macedonia, from the year of the world 3826, to 3837.

SECTION I.

PERSEUS PREPARES FOR WAR AGAINST THE ROMANS. HE ENDEAVOURS A RECONCILIATION WITH THE ACHEANS.

* THE death of Philip happened very opportunely for suspending the war against the Romans, and giving them time to prepare for it. That prince had formed a strange design, and had already began to put it in execution ; which was, to bring a considerable body of troops, both horse and foot, from European Sarmatia, part of Poland. Certain Gauls had settled near the mouths of the Borysthenes, now called the Nieper, and had taken the name of Bastarnæ. That people were neither accustomed to till the earth, to feed cattle, nor to follow commerce ; they lived by wår, and sold their services to any people that would employ them. After having passed the Danube, Philip was to have settled them upon the lands of the Dardanians, whom he had resolved utterly to exterminate ; because, being very near neighbours of Macedonia, they never failed to take every favourable occasion for making irruptions into it. The Bastarnæ were to leave their wives and children in this new settlement, and to march into Italy, in order to enrich themselves with the booty they were in hopes of making there. Whatever the success might be, Philip conceived he should find great advantages in it ; if it should happen that the Bastarnæ were conquered by the Romans, he should easily be consoled for their defeat, in seeing himself delivered from the Dardanians, by their means ; and, if their irruption into Italy succeeded, whilst the Romans were employed in repulsing these new enemies, he should have time to recover all he had lost in Greece. The Bastarnæ were already upon their march, and were considerably advanced, when they received advice of Philip's death. This news, and several accidents that befel them, suspended their first design, and they dispersed into different parts. Antigonus, whom Philip intended for his successor, had been employed against his will, in negotiating this affair. At his return, Perseus put him to death; and, to assure himself the better of the throne, sent ambassadors to the Romans, to demand, that they would renew with him the alliance they had made with his father, and that the senate would acknowledge him king. His sole intent was to gain time.

* A. M. 3826. Ant. J. C. 178. Liv. l. xl. n. 57, 58. Oros. l. iv. c. 20.

^b Part of the Bastarnæ had pursued their route, and were actually at war with the Dardanians. The Romans took umbrage at it. Perseus excused himself, by his ambassadors, and represented, that he had not sent for them, and had no share in their enterprise. The senate, without making any further inquiry into the affair, contented themselves with advising him to take care that he observed, inviolably, the treaty made with the Romans. The Bastarnæ, after having gained some advantages at first, were at length reduced, the greatest part of them, at least, to return into their own country. It is said, that having found the Danube frozen over, in endeavouring to pass it, the ice broke under them, and a great number of them were swallowed up in the river.

^c It was known at Rome, that Perseus had sent ambassadors to Carthage, and that the senate had given them audience in the night, in the temple of Esculapius. It was thought proper to send ambassadors into Macedonia, to observe the conduct of that prince. He had lately reduced the ^d Dolopians, who refused to obey him, by force of arms. After that expedition, he advanced towards Delphos, upon pretence of consulting the oracle ; but, in reality, as it was believed, to make the tour of Greece, and negotiate alliances. This journey, at first, alarmed the whole country, and occasioned so general a consternation, that even Eumenes did not think himself safe in Pergamus. But Perseus, as soon as he had consulted the oracle, returned into his own kingdom, passing through Phthiotis, Achaia, and Thessaly, without committing any hostilities in his march. He afterwards sent, either ambassadors, or circular letters, to all the states through which he had passed, to demand that they would forget such subjects of discontent as they might have had under the reign of his father, which ought to be buried in his grave.

^b A. M. 3829. Ant. J. C. 175. Freinsheim in Liv.

^c A. M. 3830. Ant. J. C. 174. Liv. l. xli. n. 27—29.

^d Dolopia was a region of Thessaly, upon the confines of Epirus.

His principal attention was to reconcile himself with the Achæans. Their league, and the city of Athens, had carried their hatred and resentment so high against the Macedonians, as to prohibit all commerce with them, by a decree. This declared enmity gave the slaves, who fled from Achaia, the opportunity of retiring into Macedonia, where they found an assured asylum ; and knew they should not be followed, or claimed, after that general interdiction. Perseus caused all these slaves to be seized, and sent them back to the Achæans, with an obliging letter, in which he exhorted them to take effectual methods for preventing their slaves from making his dominions their refuge any longer. This was tacitly demanding the reestablishment of their ancient commerce. Xenarchus, who was, at that time, in office, and desired to make his court to the king, seconded his demand very strongly, and was supported by those, who were most solicitous for recovering their slaves.

Callicrates, one of the principal persons of the assembly, who was convinced that the safety of the league consisted in the inviolable observance of the treaty concluded with the Romans, represented, that a reconciliation with Macedonia was a direct infraction of it, whilst that kingdom was making preparations to declare war against Rome, as soon as possible. He concluded, that it was necessary to leave things in their present condition, till time should explain whether their fears were just or not; that, if Macedonia continued in peace with Rome, it would be time enough when that appeared, to reestablish commerce with them; without which, an reunion would be precipitate and dangerous.

Arcon, Xenarchus's brother, who spoke after Callicrates, did his utmost to prove that such terrors were without foundation; that the question was not the making of a new treaty and alliance with Perseus, and much less to break with the Romans, but solely to reverse a decree, for which the injustice of Philip might have given room, but which Perseus, who had no share in his father's conduct, was undoubtedly far from deserving. That that prince could not but be assured, that in case of a war against the Romans, the league would not fail to declare for them. "But," added he, "whilst the peace subsists, if animosities and dissensions are not made to cease entirely, it is at least reasonable to suspend them, and to let them sleep for a while."

Nothing was concluded in this assembly. As it was taken amiss that the king had contented himself with only sending them a letter, he afterwards sent ambassadors to the assembly, which had been summoned to Megalopolis. But those who apprehended giving Rome offence, used such effectual means, that they were refused audience.

° The ambassadors, sent by the senate into Macedonia, reported, at their return, that they could not get access to the king, upon pretence that he was sometimes abroad, and sometimes indisposed; a double evasion, equally false; that for the rest, it appeared plainly, that great preparations were making for war, and that it was reasonable to expect it would speedily break out. They gave an account also of the state in which they found Etolia; that it was in great commotion from domestic divisions, which the violence of two contending parties had carried into vast disorders; and, that their authority had not been capable of reclaiming and appeasing the persons at the head of them.

As Rome expected the war with Macedonia, preparations were made for it by the religious ceremonies, which amongst the Romans always preceded declarations of war; that is to say, by expiation of prodigies, and various sacrifices offered to the gods.

Marcellus was one of the ambassadors whom the senate had sent into Greece. After having appeased, as much as possible, the troubles of Etolia, he went into Peloponnesus, where he caused the assembly of the Acheans to be summoned. He extremely applauded their zeal, in having constantly adhered to the decree, which prohibited all commerce with the kings of Macedonia. This was an open declaration of what the Romans thought with regard to Perseus.

That prince incessantly solicited the Grecian cities, by frequent embassies and magnificent promises, far exceeding his power to perform. They were sufficiently inclined in his favour, and rather more than in that of Eumenes, though the latter had rendered great services to most of those cities; and, those of his own dominions would not have changed condition with such as were entirely free. There was, however, no comparison between the two princes, in point of character and manners. Perseus was utterly infamous for his crimes and cruelties. He was accused of having murdered his wife, with his own hands, after the death of his father; of having made away with Apelles, whose aid he had used in destroying his brother; and, of having committed many other murders, both within and without his kingdom. On the contrary, Eumenes had rendered himself amiable by his tenderness for his brothers and relations; by his justice in governing his subjects; and, by his generous propensity to do good, and to serve others. Notwithstanding this difference of character, they gave Perseus the preference; whether the ancient grandeur of the Macedonian kings inspired them with contempt for a state, whose origin was wholly recent, and which they had seen take birth; or, that the Greeks had some change in view; or, because they were pleased with having some support in him to hold the Romans in respect.

^f Perseus, was particularly attentive in cultivating the amity of the Rhodians, and of separating them from the party of Rome. It was from Rhodes that Laodice, the daughter of Seleucus, went to share the Macedonian throne with Perseus, in marrying him. The Rhodians had fitted him out as fine a fleet as could be imagined. Perseus had furnished the materials, and gave gold ribands to every soldier and seaman, who came with Laodice. A sentence passed by Rome, in favour of the Lycians, against the people of Rhodes, had extremely exasperated the latter. Perseus endeavoured to take the advantage of their resentment against Rome, to attach them to himself.

^g The Romans were not ignorant of the measures taken, by Perseus, to bring over the states of Greece into his views. Eumenes came expressly to Rome, to inform them at large, of his proceedings. He was received there with all possible marks of distinction. He declared, that besides his desire to pay his homage to the gods and men, to whom he owed an establishment, which left him nothing to wish, he had undertaken this voyage, expressly, to advise the senate, in person, to be upon their guard against the enterprises of Perseus. That that prince had inherited his father's hatred for the Romans, as well as his crown, and omitted no preparations for a war, which he believed, in a manner, fallen to him in right of succession; that the long peace Macedonia had enjoyed, supplied him with the means of raising numerous and formidable troops ; that he had a rich and powerful kingdom ; that he was himself in the flower of his youth, full of ardour for military expeditions, to which he had been early inured in the sight, and under the conduct of his father, and had since much exercised himself in different enterprises against his neighbours. That he was highly considered by the cities of Greece and Asia, without seeming to have any sort of merit to support such credit, except his enmity for the Romans ; that he was upon as good terms with powerful kings ; that he had espoused the daughter of Seleucus, and given his sister in marriage to Prusias. That he had found means to engage the Beotians in his interest, a very warlike people, whom his father had never been able to bring over ; and that, but for the opposition of a few persons, well affected to the Romans, he had certainly renewed the alliance with the Achean confederates. That it was to Perseus the Etolians applied for aid, in their domestic troubles, and not to the Romans. That, supported by these powerful allies, he made such preparations for war himself, as put him into a condition to dispense with any foreign aid. That he had thirty thousand foot, five thousand horse, and provisions for ten years. That, besides his immense annual revenues from the mines, he had enough to pay ten thousand foreign troops, for a like number of years, without reckoning those of his kingdom. That he had laid up in his arsenals a sufficient quantity of arms to equip three armies, as great as that he had actually on foot ; and that, though Macedonia, should be incapable of supplying him with troops, Thrace was at his devotion, which was an inexhaustible nursery of soldiers. Eumenes added, that he advanced nothing upon simple conjecture, but upon the certain knowledge of facts, founded upon the best information. "For the rest," said he, in concluding, "having discharged the duty, which my regard and gratitude for the Roman people made indispensable, and delivered my conscience, it only remains for me to implore all the gods and goddesses, that they would inspire you with sentiments and measures consistent with the glory of your empire, and the preservation of your friends and allies, whose safety depends upon yours."

^f Polyb. Leg. 60, 61.

^g A. M. 3832. Ant. J. C. 172. Liv. l. xlii. n. 11—14.

The senators were much affected with this discourse. Nothing that passed in the senate, except that king Eumenes had spoken, was known abroad, or suffered to take air at first; so inviolably were the deliberations of that august assembly kept secret.

The ambassadors from king Perseus had audience some days after. They found the senate highly prejudiced against their master, and what Harpalus, one of them, said in his speech, inflamed them still more against him. It was, that Perseus desired to be believed, upon his own word, when he declared he had neither done nor said any thing that argued an enemy; that, as for the rest, if he discovered that they were obstinately bent upon a rupture with him, he should know how to defend himself with valor. That the fortune and events of war are always hazardous and uncertain.

The cities of Greece and Asia, anxious for the effect which these embassies might produce at Rome, had also sent deputies thither under different pretexts, especially the Rhodians, who suspected that Eumenes had joined them in his accusation against Perseus, and were not deceived. In an audience granted them, they inveighed violently against Eumenes, reproaching him with having stirred up Lycia against the Rhodians, and of having rendered himself more insupportable to Asia, than Antiochus himself. This discourse was very agreeable to the Asiatic people, who secretly favoured Perseus, but very much displeased the senate; and, had no other effect than to make them suspect the Rhodians, and have Eumenes in higher consideration, from this kind of conspiracy which they saw formed against him. He was dismissed, in consequence, with the highest honours, and great presents.

^b Harpalus, having returned into Macedonia with the utmost diligence, reported to Perseus, that he had left the Romans in a disposition not to defer long a declaration of war against him. The king was not sorry upon that account, believing himself in a condition, with the great preparations he had made, to support it with success. He was more particularly glad of a rupture with Eumenes, from whom he suspected that Rome had been apprized of his most secret measures; and began, with declaring against him, not by the way of arms, but by that of the most criminal treachery. He despatched Evander, of Crete, the general of his auxiliary forces, with three Macedonians, who had already been employed by him, upon like occasions, to assassinate that prince. Perseus knew that he was preparing for a journey to Delphos, and directed his assassins to Praxo, a woman of condition, in whose house he had lodged, when he was in that city. They lay in ambush, in a narrow defile, where two men could not pass abreast. When the king came there, the assassins rolled two great stones down upon him, one of which fell upon his head, and laid him upon the earth without sense, and the other wounded him considerably in the shoulder; after which, they poured an hail of lesser stones upon him. All that were with him fled, except one, who staid to assist him. The assassins, believing the king dead, made off to the top of mount Parnassus. His officers found him, when they returned, without motion, and almost without life. When he came a little to himself, he was carried to Corinth, and from thence into the island of Egina, where great care was taken to cure his wounds; but, with so much secrecy, that no one was admitted into his chamber, which gave reason to believe him dead. That report spread even to Asia. Attalus gave credit to it too soon for a good brother; and, looking upon himself already as king, was preparing to espouse the widow. Eumenes, at their first interview, could not forbear making him some gentle reproaches upon that head, though he had at first resolved to dissemble his sense of his brother's imprudence.

^b Liv. l. xlii. n. 15—19.

Perseus had attempted, at the same time, to poison him, by the means of Rammius, who had made a voyage into Macedonia. He was a rich citizen of Brundisium, who received in his house all the Roman generals, foreign lords, and even princes, who passed through that city. The king put into his hands a very subtle poison, for him to give Eumenes, when he should come to his house. Rammius did not dare to refuse this commission, whatever horror he had for it, lest the king should make a trial of the draught upon himself; but, he set out with a full resolution not to execute it. Having been informed that Valerius was at Chalcis, upon his return from his embassy into Macedonia, he went to him, discovered the whole, and attended him to Rome. Valerius also carried Praxo thither along with him, at whose house the assassins had lodged in Delphos. When the senate had heard these two witnesses, after such black attempts, they thought it unnecessary to deliberate longer upon declaring war against a prince, who made use of assassinations and poison, to rid himself of his enemies, and proceeded to take due measures for the success of so important an enterprise.

Two ambassadors, who arrived at Rome, about the same time, gave the senate great pleasure. The first came from Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, the fifth of that name. He sent the son, whom he intended for his successor, to Rome, to be educated there, from his earliest infancy, in the principles of the Romans, and to form himself in the great art of reigning, by the conversation and study of their great men; and, he desired that the Roman people would take him into their care and tuition. The young prince was received with all the marks of distinction that could be shown him, and the senate caused a commodious house to be provided for him, at the expense of the public. The other embassy was from the Thracians, who desired to be admitted into the alliance and amity of the Romans.

As soon as Eumenes was entirely recovered, he repaired to Pergamus, and applied himself in making preparations for war with uncommon ardour, excited by the new crime of his enemy. The senate sent ambassadors to compliment him upon the extreme danger he had escaped; and despatched others, at the same time, to confirm the kings, their allies, in their ancient amity with the Roman people.

They sent also to Perseus to make their complaints, and to demand satisfaction. These ambassadors, seeing that they could not have audience for many days, set out in order to return to Rome. The king caused them to be recalled. They represented, that by the treaty concluded with Philip, his father, and afterwards renewed with him, it was expressly stipulated, that he should not carry the war out of his own kingdom, nor attack the Roman people. They then repeated all his contraventions to that treaty, and demanded that restitution should be made to the allies of all he had taken from them by force. The king replied only with rage and reproaches; taxing the Romans with avarice and pride, and of treating kings with insupportable haughtiness, to whom they pretended to dictate laws, as to their slaves. Upon their demanding a positive answer, he referred them to the next day, when he intended to give it them in writing. The substance of it was, that the treaty concluded with his father did not affect him; that, if he had accepted it, it was not because he approved it, but because he could do no otherwise, not being sufficiently established upon the throne; that, if the Romans were for entering into a new treaty, and would propose reasonable conditions, he should consult what it was necessary for him to do. The king, after having delivered this writing, withdrew immediately; and, the ambassadors declared, that the Roman people renounced his alliance and amity. The king returned in great wrath, and told them, in a menacing tone, that they should take care to quit his kingdom in three days. At their return to Rome, they reported the result of their embassy; and added, that they had observed, in all the cities of Macedonia, through which they passed, that great preparations were making for war.

¹ Liv. l. xlii. n. 25 - 27.

The ambassadors, that had been sent to the kings, their allies, reported, that they found Eumenes in Asia, Antiochus in Syria, and Ptolemy in Egypt, well inclined to the Roman people, and ready to do every thing that should be desired of them. The senate would not grant audience to the ambassadors of Gentius, king of Illyria, who was accused of holding intelligence with Perseus; and, deferred hearing those from the Rhodians, who had also rendered themselves suspected, till the new consuls entered upon their office. However, not to lose time, orders were given for fitting out a fleet of fifty gallies, to sail as soon as possible, for Macedonia, which was executed without delay.

P. Licinius Crassus, and C. Cassius Longinus, were elected consuls, and Macedonia fell, by lot, to Licinius.

Not only Rome and Italy, but all the kings and cities, as well of Europe as Asia, had their eyes fixed upon the two great powers upon the point of entering into a war.

Eumenes was animated with an ancient hatred against Perseus ; and, still more, by the new crime, which had almost cost him his life, in his voyage to Delphos.

Prusias, king of Bithynia, had resolved to stand neuter, and wait the event. He flattered himself, that the Romans would not insist upon his taking up arms against his wife's brother ; and hoped, if Perseus were victorious, that prince would easily acquiesce in his neutrality, at the request of his sister.

Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, besides having promised to rid the Romans, inviolably adhered, either in war or peace, to the party Eumenes espoused, after having contracted an affinity with him, by giving him his daughter in marriage.

Antiochus had formed a design to possess himself of Egypt ; relying upon the weakness of the king's youth, and the indolence and cowardice of those who had the care of his person and affairs. He imagined, that he had found a plausible pretext for making war upon that prince, by disputing Celosyria with him ; and, that the Romans, employed in the war with Macedonia, would not obstruct his ambitious designs. He had, however, declared to the senate, by his ambassadors, that they might dispose of all his forces, and had repeated the same promise to the ambassadors the Romans had sent to him.

Ptolemy, through his tender age, was incapable to resolve for himself. His guardians made preparations for the war with Antiochus, in defence of Celysiria, and promised to contribute every thing in their power to the aid of the Romans in the Macedonian war.

Masinissa supplied the Romans with corn, troops, and elephants, and intended to send his son Misagenes to join them. His plan, and political motives were the effect of his desire to possess himself of the Carthaginian territories. If the Romans conquered, he conceived it impossible to execute that project, because they would never suffer him to ruin the Carthaginians entirely; in which case, he should continue in his present condition. If, on the contrary, the Roman power, which alone prevented him, out of policy, from extending his conquests, and at that time supported Carthage, should happen to be reduced, he expected, in consequence, to make himself master of all Africa.

Gentius, king of Illyria, had only rendered himself much suspected by the Romans, without knowing, however, which party he should choose; and, it seemed, that if he adhered to either, it would be rather out of caprice, and by chance, than from any fixed plan, or regular project.

As for Cotys of Thrace, king of the Odrysæ, he had declared openly for the Macedonians.

Such was the disposition of the kings, with regard to the Macedonian war. As for the states and free cities, the populace were universally inclined in favour of Perseus and the Macedonians. The opinions of the persons in authority, amongst those people, were divided into three classes. Some of them abandoned themselves so abjectly to the Romans, that, by their blind devotion to them, they lost all credit and reputation with their citizens ; and, of these, few concerned themselves about the justice of the Roman government ; most of them having no views, but to their private interest, convinced that their power in their cities would subsist in proportion to the services they should render the Romans. The second class was of those, who gave entirely in to the king's measures ; some, because their debts, and the bad state of their affairs, made them desire a change ; others, because the pomp that reigns in the courts of kings, upon which Perseus valued himself, agreed best with their own little pride and vanity. A third class, which were the most prudent and judicious, if it were absolutely necessary to take either part, would have preferred the Romans' to the king's ; but, had it been left to their choice, they would have been best satisfied, that neither of the parties should become too powerful, by reducing the other ; and, preserving a kind of equality and balance, should always continue in peace ; because, then, one of them, by taking the weaker states under its protection, whenever the other should attempt to oppress them, would render the condition of them all more happy and secure. In this kind of indeterminate neutrality, they saw, as from a place of safety, the battles and dangers of those, who had engaged in either party.

The Romans, after having, according to their laudable custom, discharged all the duties of religion, offered solemn prayers and sacrifices to the gods, and made vows for the happy success of the enterprise they had been so long preparing for, declared war, in form, against Perseus, king of Macedonia, except he made immediate satisfaction, in regard to the several grievances, already more than once explained to him.

At the same time arrived ambassadors from him, who said, that the king their master, was much amazed at their having made troops enter Macedonia, and that he was ready to give the senate all the satisfaction in his power. As it was known that Perseus sought only to gain time, they were answered, that the consul Licinius would be soon in Macedonia with his army; and that, if the king desired peace in earnest, he might send his ambassadors to him; but, that he need not give himself the trouble of sending any more into Italy, where they would not be received; and, for themselves, they were ordered to quit it in twelve days.

^k The Romans omitted nothing that might contribute to the success of their arms. They despatched ambassadors on all sides, to their allies, to animate and confirm those who persisted to adhere to them; to determine such as were fluctuating and uncertain; and, to intimidate those who appeared inclined to break with them.

Whilst they were at Larissa, in Thessaly, ambassadors arrived there from Perseus, who had orders to address themselves to Marcius, one of the Roman ambassadors, to remind him of the ancient ties of friendship his father had contracted with king Philip, and to demand an interview between him and their master. Marcius answered, that his father had often spoke of king Philip's friendship and hospitality, and appointed a place near the river Peneus, for the interview. They went thither some days after. The king had a great train, and was surrounded with a crowd of great lords and guards. The ambassadors were no less attended ; many of the citizens of Larissa, and of the deputies from other states, who had repaired thither, making it a duty to go with them, well pleased with that occasion of carrying home what they should see and hear. They had, besides, a curiosity to be present at an interview between a great king, and the ambassadors of the most powerful people in the world.

^k Liv. l. xlii. n. 37—44. Polyb. Leg. 63.

After some difficulties, which arose about the ceremonial, and were soon removed in favour of the Romans, who had the precedency, they began to confer. Their meeting was highly respectful on both sides. They did not treat each other like enemies, but rather as friends, bound in the sacred ties of hospitality. Marcius, who spoke first, began by excusing himself for the unhappy necessity he was under, of reproaching a prince, for whom he had the highest consideration. He afterwards expatiated upon all the causes of complaint the Roman people had against him, and his various infractions of treaty with them. He insisted very much on his attempt upon Eumenes ; and, concluded with professing, that he should be very glad the king would supply him with good reasons for his conduct, and thereby enable him to plead his cause, and justify him before the senate.

Perseus, after having touched lightly upon the affair of Eumenes, which he seemed astonished that any one should presume to impute to him, without any proof, rather than to so many others of that prince's enemies, entered into a long discourse ; and replied, in the best manner possible, to the several heads of the accusation against him. "Of this I am assured,"¹ said he, in concluding, "that my conscience does not reproach me with having committed any fault knowingly, and with premeditated design, against the Romans ; and, if I have done any thing unwarily, apprized as I now am, it is in my power to amend it. I have certainly acted nothing to deserve the implacable enmity with which I am pursued, as guilty of the blackest and most enormous crimes, and neither to be expiated nor forgiven. It must be without foundation, that the clemency and wisdom of the Roman people is universally extolled, if, for such slight causes, as scarce merit complaint and remonstrance, they take up arms, and make war upon kings in alliance with them."

The result of this conference was, that Perseus should send new ambassadors to Rome, in order to try all possible means to prevent a rupture and open war. This was a snare laid by the artful commissioner for the king's inadvertency, and to gain time. He feigned at first great difficulties in complying with the truce demanded by Perseus, for time to send his ambassadors to Rome, and seemed at last, to give in to it, only out of consideration for the king. The true reason was, because the Romans had not yet either troops or general in a condition to act ; whereas, on the side of Perseus, every thing was ready ; and, if he had not been amused by the vain hope of a peace, he might have taken the advantage of a conjuncture so favourable for himself, and so contrary to his enemies, to have entered upon action.

¹ Conscius mihi sum, nihil me scientem deliquisse ; et si quid fecerim imprudentia lapsus, corrige me et emendari castigatione hac posse. Nihil certe insanabile, nec quod bello et armis persequendum esse censeatis, commisi ; aut frustra clementiæ gravitatisque vestræ fama vulgata per gentes est, si talibus de causis, quæ vix querela et expostulatione dignæ sunt, arma capitis, et regibus sociis bella infertis. Liv.

After this interview, the Roman ambassadors advanced into Beotia, where there had been great commotions ; some declaring for Perseus, and others for the Romans ; but, at length, the latter party prevailed. The Thebans, and the other people of Beotia, by their example, made an alliance with the Romans ; each, by their own deputies, and not by the consent of the whole body of the nation, according to ancient custom. In this manner the Beotians, from having rashly engaged in the party of Perseus, after having formed, through a long course of time, a republic, which, on several occasions, had preserved itself from the greatest dangers, saw themselves separated and governed by as many councils, as there were cities in the province ; all of which, in the sequel, remained independent of each other, and formed no longer one united league, as at first. And this was an effect of the Roman policy, which divided them, to make them weak ; well knowing, that it was much easier to bring them into their measures, and subject them, by that means, than if their union subsisted. No other cities in Beotia, except Coronea and Haliartus, persisted in the alliance with Persius.

From Beotia the commissioners went into Peloponnesus. The assembly of the Achean league was summoned to Argos. They demanded only one thousand men, to garrison Chalcis, till the Roman army should enter Greece; which troops were ordered thither immediately. Marcius and Atilius, having terminated the affairs of Greece, returned to Rome in the beginning of the winter.

^m About the same time, Rome sent new commissioners into the most considerable islands of Asia, to exhort them to send powerful aid into the field against Perseus. The Rhodians signalized themselves upon this occasion. Hegesilochus, who was at that time prytanis, the principal magistrate was so called, had prepared the people, by representing to them, that it was necessary to efface by actions, and not by words only, the bad impressions, with which Eumenes had endeavoured to inspire the Romans, in regard to their fidelity; so that upon the arrival of the ambassadors, they showed them a fleet of forty ships, entirely equipped, and ready to sail upon the first orders. This agreeable surprise was highly pleasing to the Romans, who returned from thence exceedingly satisfied with so distinguished a zeal, which had prevented their demands.

Perseus, in consequence of his interview with Marcius, sent ambassadors to Rome, to treat there, upon what had been proposed in that conference. He despatched other ambassadors with letters for

^m Liv. l. xlii. n. 45—48. Polyb. Leg. 64—68.

Rhodes and Byzantium, in which he explained what had passed in the interview, and deduced, at large, the reasons upon which his conduct was founded. He exhorted the Rhodians, in particular, to remain quiet, and to wait as spectators only, till they saw what resolutions the Romans would take. "If, contrary to the treaties subsisting between us, they attack me, you will be," said he, "the mediators between the two nations. All the world is interested in their continuing to live in peace, and it behoves none more than you to endeavour their reconciliation. Defenders, not only of your own, but the liberty of all Greece, the more zeal and ardour you have for so great a good, the more ought you to be upon your guard against whomsoever should attempt to inspire you with different sentiments. You cannot but know, that the certain means ⁿ to reduce Greece into slavery, is to make it dependent upon one people only, without leaving it any other to have recourse to." The ambassadors were received with great respect; but were answered, that in case of war, the king was desired not to rely upon the Rhodians, nor to demand any thing of them, in prejudice to the alliance they had made with the Romans. The same ambassadors went also into Beotia, where they had almost as little reason to be satisfied; only a few small cities ^o separating from the Thebans to embrace the king's party.

ⁿ Cum cæterorum id interesse, tum præcipue Rhodiorum, quo plus inter alias civitates dignitate atque opibus excellant, quæ serva atque obnoxia fore, si nullus alio sit quam ad Romanos respectus. Liv.

^o Coronea and Haliartus.

Marcus and Atilius, at their return to Rome, reported to the senate the success of their commission. They dwelt particularly upon the address of their stratagem to deceive Perseus, by granting him a truce, which prevented him from beginning the war immediately with advantage, as he might have done, and gave the Romans time to complete their preparations, and to take the field. They did not forget their success in dissolving the general assembly of the Beotians, to prevent their uniting with Macedonia by common consent.

The greatest part of the senate expressed great satisfaction in so wise a conduct, which argued profound policy and uncommon dexterity in negotiation. But the old senators, who had imbibed other principles, and persevered in their ancient maxims, said, they did not see the Roman character sustained in such dealing. That their ancestors, relying more upon true valor than fraud, used to make war openly, and not in disguise and under cover; that such unworthy artifices became the Carthaginians and Grecians, with whom it was more glorious to deceive an enemy, than conquer him with open force. That, indeed, stratagem sometimes, in the moment of action, seemed to succeed better than valor; but, that a victory, obtained vigorously in a battle, where the force of the troops on each side was tried as near as possible, and which the enemy could not ascribe either to chance or cunning, was of a much more lasting effect, because it left a strong conviction of the victor's superior force and bravery.

Notwithstanding these remonstrances of the ancient senators, who could not relish these new maxims of policy, that part of the senate which preferred the useful to the honourable, were much the majority upon this occasion, and the conduct of the two commissioners was approved. Marcius was sent again with some galleys into Greece, to regulate affairs, as he should think most consistent with the service of the public ; and Atilius into Thessaly, to take possession of Larissa, lest, upon the expiration of the truce, Perseus should make himself master of that important place, the capital of the country. Lentulus was also sent to Thebes, to have an eye upon Beotia.

Though the war with Perseus was resolved at Rome, the senate gave audience to his ambassadors. They repeated the same things which had been said in the interview with Marcius ; and, endeavoured to justify their master, principally upon the attempt he was accused of having made on the person of Eumenes. They were heard with little or no attention ; and the senate ordered them, and all the Macedonians at Rome, to quit the city immediately, and Italy in thirty days. The consul Licinius, who was to command in Macedonia, had orders to march, as soon as possible, with his army. The pretor Lucretius, who had the command of the fleet, set out with forty five galleys from Cephalonia, and arrived, in five days, at Naples, where he was to wait for the land forces.

SECTION II.

LICINIUS AND PERSEUS TAKE THE FIELD. THE LATTER HAS AT FIRST CONSIDERABLY THE ADVANTAGE.

THE consul Licinius, after having offered his vows to the gods in the capitol, set out from Rome, covered with a coat of arms, according to the custom. The departure of the consuls, says Livy, was always attended with great solemnity, and an incredible concourse of the people, especially upon an important war, and against a powerful enemy. Besides the interest every particular might have in the glory of the consul, the citizens were induced to throng about him, out of a curiosity to see the general, to whose prudence and valor the fate of the republic was confided. A thousand anxious thoughts presented themselves, at that time, to their minds, upon the events of the war, which are always precarious and uncertain. They remembered the defeats which had happened through the bad conduct and temerity, and the victories for which they were indebted to the wisdom and courage of their generals. "What mortal," said they, "can know the fate of a consul, at his departure; whether we shall see him with his victorious army, return in triumph to the capitol, from whence he sets out, after having offered up his prayers to the gods, or whether the enemy may not rejoice in his overthrow?" The ancient glory of the Macedonians; that of Philip, who had made himself famous by his wars, and particularly by that against the Romans, added very much to the reputation of Perseus; and, every body knew, that from his succession to the crown, a war had been expected from him. Full of such thoughts, the citizens conducted the consul out of the city. C. Claudius, and Q. Mutius, who had both been consuls, did not think it below them to serve in his army, in quality of military tribunes, or as colonels or brigadiers, and went with him ; as did P. Lentulus, and the two Manlii Acidini. The consul repaired in their company to Brundisium, which was the rendezvous of the army ; and, passing the sea with all his troops, arrived at Nympheum, in the country of the Apollonians.

Perseus, some days before, upon the return of his ambassadors from Rome, and their assuring him that there remained no hope of peace, held a great council, in which opinions were different. Some thought it necessary for him either to pay tribute, if required, or give up a part of his dominions, if the Romans insisted upon it ; in a word, to suffer every thing supportable, for the sake of peace, rather than expose his person and kingdom to the danger of entire destruction ; that, if a part of his kingdom was left him, time and chance might produce favourable conjunctures, to put him in a condition, not only to recover all he had lost, but to render him formidable to those, who, at present, made Macedonia tremble.

The greater number were of a quite different opinion. They insisted, that by making cession of a part, he must determine to lose all his kingdom ; that it was neither money nor lands that incited the ambition of the Romans, but universal empire ; that they knew the greatest kingdoms and most powerful empires, were subject to frequent revolutions ; that they had humbled, or rather ruined Carthage, without taking possession of its territories; contenting themselves with keeping it in awe by the neighbourhood of Masinissa; that they had driven Antiochus, and his son, beyond mount Taurus; that there was no kingdom but Macedonia, to give umbrage to, or make head against the Romans; that prudence required Perseus, whilst he was still master of it, seriously to consider with himself, whether by making the Romans sometimes one concession, and sometimes another, he was resolved to see himself deprived of all power, expelled from his dominions, and obliged to ask, as a favour, of the Romans, permission to retire, and confine himself in Samothracia, or some other island, there to pass the rest of his days in contempt and misery, with the mortification of surviving his glory and empire; or, whether he would choose to hazard, in arms, all the dangers of the war, in defence of his fortunes and dignity, as became a man of courage; and, in case of being victorious, have the glory of delivering the universe from the Roman yoke. That it would be no more a wonder to drive the Romans out of Greece, than it had been to drive Hannibal out of Italy; besides, was it consistent for Perseus, after having opposed his brother, with all his efforts, when he attempted to usurp the crown, to resign it meanly to strangers, who endeavoured to wrest it out of his hands? That, in fine, all the world agreed, that there was nothing more inglorious than to give up empire without resistance, nor more laudable than to have used all possible endeavours to preserve it.

This council was held at Pella, the ancient capital of Macedonia. "Since you think it so necessary," said the king, "let us make war then, with the help of the gods." He gave orders, at the same time, to his generals, to assemble all their troops at Citium, whither he went, soon after, himself, with all the lords of his court, and his regiments of guards, after having offered a sacrifice of an hecatomb, or an hundred oxen, to Minerva Alcidema. He found the whole army assembled there. It amounted, including the foreign troops, to thirty nine thousand foot, of whom, almost half composed the phalanx, and four thousand horse. It was agreed, that since the army, Alexander the Great led into Asia, no king of Macedonia had commanded one so numerous.

It was twenty six years since Philip had made peace with the Romans ; and as, during all that time, Macedonia had remained in tranquillity, and without any considerable war, there were in it great numbers of youth, capable of bearing arms, who had already begun to exercise and form themselves in the wars Macedonia had supported against the Thracians, their neighbours. Philip, besides, and Perseus after him, had long before formed the design of undertaking a war with the Romans. Hence it was, that, at the time we speak of, every thing was ready for beginning it.

Perseus, before he took the field, thought it necessary to harangue his troops. He mounted his throne, therefore, and from thence, having his two sons on each side of him, spoke to them with great force. He began with a long recital of all the injuries the Romans had committed with regard to his father, which had induced him to resolve to take up arms against them ; but, that design, a sudden death had prevented him from putting into execution. He added, that presently after the death of Philip, the Romans had sent ambassadors to him ; and, at the same time, marched troops into Greece, to take possession of the strongest places ; that, afterwards, in order to gain time, they had amused him, during all the winter, with deceitful interviews, and a pretended truce, under the specious pretext of negotiating a reconciliation. He compared the consul's army, which was actually on its march, with that of the Macedonians ; which, in his sense, was much superior to the other, not only in the number and valor of their troops, but in ammunition and provisions of war, laid up with infinite care, during a great number of years. "It remains, therefore, Macedonians," said he, in concluding, "only to act with the same courage your ancestors showed, when, having triumphed over all Europe, they crossed into Asia, and set no other bounds to their conquests, than those of the universe. You are not now to carry your arms to the extremities of the east, but to defend yourselves in the possession of the kingdom of Macedonia. When the Romans attacked my father, they covered that unjust war with the false pretence of reestablishing the ancient liberty of Greece ; the present they undertake without any disguise, to reduce and enslave Macedonia. That haughty people cannot bear, that the Roman empire should have any king for its neighbour, nor, that any warlike nation should have arms for its defence ; for, you may be assured, if you refuse to make war, and will submit to the orders of those insulting masters, that you must resolve to deliver up your arms, with your king and his kingdom to them."

At these words, the whole army, which had expressed no immoderate applause for the rest of his discourse, raised cries of anger and indignation, exhorting the king to entertain the best hopes, and demanding earnestly to be led against the enemy.

Perseus then gave audience to the ambassadors from the cities of Macedonia, who came to offer him money and provisions for the occasions of the army, each according to their power. The king thanked them in the kindest manner, but did not accept their offers; giving, for his reason, that the army was abundantly provided with all things necessary. He only demanded carriages for the battering rams, catapultæ, and other machines of war.

The two armies were now in motion. That of the Macedonians, after some days march, arrived at Sycurium, a city situated at the foot of mount Oeta; the consul's was at Gomphi, in Thessaly, after having surmounted the most incredible difficulties in ways and defiles almost impracticable. The Romans themselves confessed, that, had the enemy defended those passes, they might easily have destroyed their whole army in them. The consul advanced within three miles of the country called Tripolis, and encamped upon the banks of the river Peneus.

At the same time, Eumenes arrived at Chalcis, with his brothers Attalus and Atheneus; Phileterus, the fourth, was left at Pergamus for the defence of the country. Eumenes and Attalus joined the consul with four thousand foot and one thousand horse. They had left Atheneus, with two thousand foot, at Chalcis, to reinforce the garrison of that important place. The allies sent also other troops, though in numbers sufficiently inconsiderable, and some gallies. Perseus, in the mean time, sent out several detachments to ravage the country in the neighbourhood of Pheræ, in hopes, that if the consul should quit his camp, and march to the aid of the cities in his alliance, that he might surprise and attack him to advantage; but, he was disappointed, and obliged to content himself with distributing the booty he had made amongst his soldiers, which was very considerable, and consisted principally in cattle of all sorts.

The consul and king held each of them a council, at the same time, in order to resolve in what manner to begin the war. The king, highly proud of having been suffered to ravage the territories of the Phereans without opposition, thought it advisable to go and attack the Romans, in their camp, without loss of time. The Romans judged rightly, that their slowness and delays would discredit them very much with their allies, and reproached themselves with not having defended the people of Pheræ. Whilst they were consulting upon the measures it was necessary to take, Eumenes and Attalus being present, a courier came in upon the spur, and informed them the enemy were very near, with a numerous army. The signal was immediately given for the soldiers to stand to their arms, and one hundred horse detached, with as many of the light armed foot, to take a view of the enemy. Perseus, at ten in the morning, finding himself no farther from the Roman camp than a small half league, made his foot halt, and advanced with his horse and light armed soldiers. He had scarce marched a quarter of a league, when he perceived a body of the enemy, against which he sent a small detachment of horse, supported by some light armed troops. As the two detachments were very near equal in number, and neither side sent any fresh troops to their aid, the skirmish ended without its being possible to say which side was victorious. Perseus marched back his troops to Sycurium.

The next day, at the same hour, Perseus advanced, with all his troops, to the same place. They were followed by chariots laden with water, for there was none to be found within six leagues of the place; the way was very dusty, and the troops might have been obliged to fight immediately, which would have incommoded them exceedingly. The Romans keeping close in their camp, and having withdrawn their advanced guards within their intrenchments, the king's troops returned to their camp. They did the same several days, in hopes the Romans would not fail to detach their cavalry to attack their rear guard; and, when they had drawn them on far enough from their camp, and the battle was begun, that they might face about. As the king's horse and light armed foot were very much superier to those of the Romans, they assured themselves it would be no difficulty to defeat them.

The first design not succeeding, the king encamped nearer the enemy, within little more than two leagues of them. At break of day, having drawn up his infantry, in the same place as he had done the two preceding days, about one thousand paces from the enemy, he advanced, at the head of his cavalry and light armed foot, towards the camp of the Romans. The dust, which flew nearer than usual, and was raised by a greater number of troops, gave them the alarm, and the first who brought the news, could scarcely believe that the enemy was so near ; because, for several days before, they had not appeared till ten in the morning, and the sun, at that time, was just rising. But when it was confirmed by the cries of many, who ran in crowds from the gates, there was no longer any room to doubt it, and the camp was in very great confusion. All the officers repaired with the utmost haste to the general's tent, as the soldiers did each to his own. The negligence of the consul, so ill informed in the motions of an enemy, whose nearness to him ought to have kept him perpetually upon his guard, gives us no great idea of his ability.

Perseus had drawn up his troops at less than five hundred paces from the consul's intrenchments. Cotys, king of the Odrysæ in Thrace, commanded the left with the horse of his nation ; the light armed troops were distributed in the intervals of the front rank. The Macedonian and Cretan horse formed the right wing. At the extremity of each wing, the king's horse and those of the auxiliaries were posted. The king kept the centre with the horse that always attended his person ; before whom, were placed the slingers and archers, to about four hundred in number.

The consul having drawn up his foot in battle array, within his camp, detached only his cavalry and light armed troops, who had orders to form a line in the front of his intrenchments. The right wing, which consisted of all the Italian horse, was commanded by C. Licinius Crassus, the consul's brother ; the left, composed of the horse of the Grecian allies, by M. Valerius Levinus ; both intermingled with the light armed troops. Q. Mucius was posted in the centre, with a select body of horse ; two hundred Gallic horse, and three hundred of Eumenes's troops, were drawn up in his front ; four hundred Thessalian horse were placed a little beyond the left wing, as a reserved body. King Eumenes, and his brother Attalus, with their troops, were posted in the space between the intrenchments and the rear ranks.

This was only an engagement of cavalry, which was almost equal on both sides, and might amount to about four thousand on each, without including the light armed troops. The action began with slings and missive weapons, which were posted in front ; but that was only the prelude. The Thracians, like wild beasts long shut up, and thereby the more furious, threw themselves first upon the right wing of the Romans, who, perfectly brave and intrepid, as they were, could not support so rude and violent a charge. The light armed foot, whom the Thracians had amongst them, beat down the lances of the enemy with their swords, sometimes cutting the legs of the horses, and sometimes wounding them in their flanks. Perseus, who attacked the centre of the enemy, soon put the Greeks into disorder ; and, as they were vigorously pursued in their flight, the Thessalian horse, which, at a small distance from the left wing, formed a body of reserve, and in the beginning of the action, had been only spectators of the battle, was of great service when that wing gave way ; for, those horse, retiring gently and in good order, after having joined the auxiliary troops of Eumenes, gave a safe retreat between their ranks to those who fled, and were dispersed ; and, when they saw the enemy was not warm in their pursuit, were so bold as to advance to sustain and encourage their own party. As this body of horse marched in good order, and always kept their ranks, the king's cavalry, who had broke in the pursuit, did not dare to wait their approach, nor to come to blows with them.

Hippias, and Leonatus having learned the advantage of the cavalry, that the king might not lose so favourable an opportunity of completing the glory of the day, by vigorously pushing the enemy, and charging them in their intrenchments, brought on the Macedonian phalanx of their own accord, and without orders. It appeared, indeed, that had the king made the least effort, he might have rendered his victory complete ; and, in the present ardour of his troops, and terror, into which they had thrown the Romans, the latter must have been entirely defeated. Whilst he was deliberating with himself, between hope and fear, upon what he should resolve, Evander of Crete,^a in whom he reposed great confidence, upon seeing the phalanx advance, ran immediately to Perseus, and earnestly begged of him not to abandon himself to his present success, nor engage rashly in a new action, that was not necessary, and wherein he hazarded every thing. He represented to him, that if he continued quiet, and contented himself with the present advantage, he would either obtain honourable conditions of peace; or, if he should choose to continue the war, his first success would infallibly determine those, who, till then, had remained neuter, to declare in his favour. The king was already inclined to follow that opinion; wherefore, having praised the counsel and zeal of Evander, he caused the retreat to be sounded for his horse, and ordered his foot to return to the camp.

^a Perseus made use of him in the intended assassination of Eumenes

The Romans lost two thousand of their light armed infantry, at least, in this battle, and had two hundred of their horse killed, and as many taken prisoners. On the other side, only twenty of their cavalry, and forty foot soldiers, were left upon the place. The victors returned into their camp with great joy; especially the Thracians, who, with songs of triumph, carried the heads of those they had killed upon the ends of their pikes; it was to them Perseus was principally indebted for his victory. The Romans, on the contrary, in profound sorrow, kept a mournful silence; and, filled with terror, expected every moment, that the enemy would come and attack them in their camp. Eumenes was of opinion, that it was proper to remove the camp to the other side of the Peneus, in order that the river might serve as an additional fortification for the troops, till they had recovered their panic. The consul was averse to taking that step, which, as an open profession of fear, was highly dishonourable to himself and his army; but, however, being convinced by reason, he yielded to necessity, passed with his troops, by favour of the night, and encamped on the other bank of the river.

Perseus advanced, the next day, to attack the enemy, and to give them battle, but it was then too late ; he found their camp abandoned. When he saw them intrenched on the other side of the river, he perceived the enormous error he had committed the day before, in not pursuing them immediately, upon their defeat ; but, he confessed it a still greater fault to have continued quiet and inactive, during the night ; for, without putting the rest of his army in motion, if he had only detached his light armed troops against the enemy, during their confusion and disorder in passing the river, he might, without difficulty, have cut off at least part of their army.

We see here, in a sensible example, to what causes revolutions of states, and the fall of the greatest empires, owe their being. There is no reader but must have been surprised at seeing Perseus stop short in a decisive moment, and let slip an almost certain occasion of defeating his enemy ; it requires no great capacity, or penetration, to distinguish so gross a fault. But, how came it to pass, that Perseus, who wanted neither judgment nor experience, should be so much mistaken ? A notion is suggested to him, by a man he confides in. It is weak, rash, and absurd ; but God, who rules the heart of man, and who wills the destruction of the kingdom of Macedonia, suffers no other notion to prevail in the king's breast, and removes every thought which might, and naturally ought to have induced him to take quite different measures. Nor is that sufficient. The first fault might have been easily retrieved by a little vigilance during the night. God seems to have laid that prince and his army in a profound sleep. Not one of his officers has the least thought of observing the motions of the enemy in the night. We see nothing but what is natural in all this ; but, the holy scripture teaches us to think otherwise, and what was said of Saul's soldiers and officers, we may well apply to this event ; "And, no man saw it, nor knew it, neither awaked ; for, they were all asleep, because a deep sleep from the Lord was fallen upon them." 1 Sam. xxvi. 12.

The Romans, indeed, having put the river between them and the enemy, saw themselves no longer in danger of being suddenly attacked and routed ; but the check they had lately received, and the wound they had given the glory of the Roman name, made them feel the sharpest affliction. All who were present in the council of war assembled by the consul, laid the fault upon the Etolians. It was said, that they were the first who took the alarm and fled ; that the rest of the Greeks had been drawn away by their example ; and, that five of the chief of their nation, were the first who took to flight. The Thessalians, on the contrary, were praised for their valor, and their leaders rewarded with several marks of honour.

The spoils taken from the Romans were not inconsiderable. They amounted to one thousand five hundred bucklers, one thousand cuirasses, and a much greater number of helmets, swords, and darts of all kinds. The king made great presents of them to the officers who had distinguished themselves most ; and, having assembled the army, he began by telling them, that what had happened was an happy presage for them, and a certain pledge of what they might hope for the future. He made great encomiums upon the troops who had been in the action, and, in magnificent terms, expatiated upon the victory over the Roman horse, in which the principal force of their army consisted, and which they had before believed invincible ; and, promised himself from thence, a more considerable success over their infantry, who had only escaped their swords by a shameful flight, during the night ; but, that it would be easy to force the intrenchments, in which their fear kept them shut up. The victorious soldiers, who carried the spoils of the enemies they had slain upon their shoulders, heard this discourse with sensible pleasure, and promised themselves every thing from their valor, judging of the future by the past. The foot, on their side, especially that which composed the Macedonian phalanx, prompted by a laudable jealousy, pretended, at least to equal, if not to excel, the glory of their companions upon the first occasion. In a word, the whole army demanded, with incredible ardour and passion, only to come to blows with the enemy. The king, after having dismissed the assembly, set forward the next day, passed the river, and encamped at Mopsium, an eminence situated between Tempe and Larissa.

The joy for the good success of so important a battle, affected Perseus, at first, in all its extent. He looked upon himself as superior to a people, who alone were so, in regard to all other princes and nations. This was not a victory gained by surprise, and in a manner stolen by stratagem and address ; but, carried by open force, and the valor and bravery of his troops, and that in his own sight, and under his own conduct. He had seen the Roman haughtiness give way before him, three times in one day ; at first, in keeping close, out of fear, in their camp ; then, when they ventured out of it, in shamefully betaking themselves to flight ; and, lastly, by flying again, during the obscurity of the night, and in finding no other security, but by being inclosed within their intrenchments, the usual refuge of terror and apprehension. These thoughts were highly soothing, and capable of deceiving a prince, already too much affected with his own merit.

But, when his first transports were a little abated, and the inebriating fume of sudden joy was somewhat evaporated, Perseus came to himself ; and, reflecting in cool blood upon all the consequences which might attend his victory, he began to be in some sort of terror. The wisest of the courtiers about him, ^r taking advantage of so happy a disposition, ventured to give him the counsel of which it made him capable ; this was, to make the best of his late success, and conclude an honourable peace with the Romans. They represented to him, that the most certain mark of a prudent and really happy prince, was not to rely too much upon the present favours of fortune, nor abandon himself to the delusive glitter of prosperity. That, therefore, he would do well to send to the consul, and propose a renovation of the treaty, upon the same conditions imposed by T. Quintius, when victorious, upon his father Philip. That he could not put an end to the war, more gloriously for himself, than after so memorable a battle ; nor hope a more favourable occasion of concluding a sure and lasting peace, than at a conjuncture, when the check the Romans had received, would render them more tractable, and better inclined to grant him good conditions ; that if, notwithstanding that check, the Romans, out of a pride too natural to them, should reject a just and equitable accommodation, he would, at least, have the consolation of having the gods and men for witnesses of his own moderation, and the haughty tenaciousness of the Romans.

^r Polyb. Leg. 69.

The king gave in to these wise remonstrances, to which he never was averse. The majority of the council also applauded them. Ambassadors were accordingly sent to the consul, who gave them audience in the presence of a numerous assembly. They told him they came to demand peace ; that Perseus would pay the same tribute to the Romans his father Philip had done, and abandon all the cities, territories, and places, that prince had abandoned.

When they withdrew, the council deliberated upon the answer it was proper to make. The Roman constancy showed itself, upon this occasion, in an extraordinary manner. It was the custom,^s at that time, to express in adversity, all the assurance and loftiness of good fortune, and to act with moderation in prosperity. The answer was, that no peace could be granted to Perseus, unless he submitted himself and his kingdom to the discretion of the senate. When it was related to the king and his friends, they were strangely surprised at so extraordinary, and, in their sense, so ill timed a pride ; most of them believed it needless to talk any further of peace, and that the Romans would be soon reduced to demand what they now refused. Perseus was not of the same opinion. He judged rightly, that Rome was not so haughty, but from a consciousness of superiority ; and, that reflection daunted him exceedingly. He sent again to the consul, and offered a more considerable tribute than had been imposed upon Philip. When he saw the consul would retract nothing from his first answer, having no longer any hopes of peace, he returned to his former camp at Sycurium, determined to try again the fortune of the war.

^s Ita tum mos erat in adversis vultum secundæ fortunæ gerere, moderari animos in secundis. Liv.

We may conclude from the whole conduct of Perseus, that he must have undertaken this war with great imprudence, and without having compared his strength and resources with those of the Romans. To believe himself happy, and after a signal victory to demand peace, and submit to more oppressive conditions, than his father Philip had complied with, till after a bloody defeat, seems to argue, that he had taken his measures, and concerted the means to success very ill, since, after a first action, entirely to his advantage, he begins to discover all his weakness and inferiority, and in some sort, inclines to despair. Why then was he he first to break the peace ? Why was he the agresor ? Why was he in such haste ? Was it to stop short at the first step ? How came he not to know his weakness, till his own victory showed it him ? These are not the signs of a wise and judicious prince.

The news of the battle of the cavalry, which soon spread in Greece, made known what the people thought, and discovered in full light, to which side they inclined.

It was received with joy, not only by the partisans of Macedonia, but even by most of those the Romans had obliged, of whom, some suffered with pain, their haughty manners, and insolence of power.

The pretor Lucretius, at the same time, besieged the city of Haliartus in Beotia.^c After a long and vigorous defence, it was taken at last by storm, plundered, and afterwards entirely demolished. Thebes soon after surrendered, and then Lucretius returned with his fleet.

Perseus, in the mean time, who was not far from the camp of the Romans, gave them great trouble, harassing their troops, and falling upon their foragers, whenever they ventured out of their camp. He took, one day, one thousand carriages, laden principally with sheaves of corn, which the Romans had been to reap, and made six hundred prisoners. He afterwards attacked a small body of troops, in the neighbourhood, of which he expected to make himself master, with little or no difficulty ; but, he found more resistance than he had imagined. That small body of men was commanded by a brave officer, called L. Pompeius, who, retiring to an eminence, defended himself there with intrepid courage, determined to die with his troops, rather than surrender. He was upon the point of being borne down by numbers, when the consul arrived to his assistance, with a great detachment of horse and light armed foot ; the legions were ordered to follow him. The sight of the consul gave Pompeius and his troops new courage, who were eight hundred men, all Romans. Perseus immediately sent for his phalanx ; but, the consul did not wait its coming up, and came directly to blows. The Macedonians, after having made a very vigorous resistance, for some time, were at last broke, and put to the rout. Three hundred foot were left upon the place, with twenty four of the best horse, of the troop called the sacred squadron, of which the commander himself, Antimachus, was killed.

^c Liv. l. xlii. n. 64—67.

The success of this action reanimated the Romans, and very much alarmed Perseus. After having put a strong garrison into Gonna, he marched back his army into Macedonia.

The consul, having reduced Perrhebia, and taken Larissa, and some other cities, dismissed all the allies, except the Acheans ; dispersed his troops in Thessaly, where he left them in winter quarters ; and went into Beotia, at the request of the Thebans, upon whom the people of Coronca had made incursions.

SECTION III.

MARCIUS ENTERS MACEDONIA. PERSEUS TAKES THE ALARM ; BUT AFTERWARDS RESUMES COURAGE.

^u NOTHING memorable passed the following year. The consul Hostilius had sent Ap. Claudius into Illyria, with four thousand foot, to defend such of the inhabitants of that country, as were allies of the Romans ; and, the latter had found means to add eight thousand men, raised among the allies, to his first body of troops. He encamped at Lychnidus, a city of the ^u A. M. 3834. Ant. J. C. 170. Liv. l. xliii. n. 9, 10.

Dassaretæ. Near that place was another city, called Uscana, which belonged to Perseus, and where he had a great garrison. Claudius, upon the promise which had been made him of having the place put into his hands, in hopes of making great booty, approached it with almost all his troops, without any order, distrust, or precaution. Whilst he thought least of it, the garrison made a furious sally upon him, put his whole army to flight, and pursued them a great way with dreadful slaughter. Of eleven thousand men, scarce two thousand escaped into the camp, which one thousand had been left to guard. Claudius returned to Lychnidus with the ruins of his army. The news of this loss very much afflicted the senate, and the more, because it had been occasioned by the imprudence and avarice of Claudius.

† This was the almost universal disease of the commanders at that time. The senate received various complaints from many cities, as well of Greece as the other provinces, against the Roman officers, who treated them with unheard of rapaciousness and cruelty. They punished some of them, redressed the wrongs they had done the cities, and dismissed the ambassadors, well satisfied with the manner in which their remonstrances had been received. Soon after, to prevent such disorders for the future, they passed a decree, which expressed, that the cities should not furnish the Roman magistrates with any thing more than what the senate expressly appointed; which ordinance was published in all the cities of Peloponnesus.

† Polyb. Leg. 74. Liv. l. xliiii. n. 17.

C. Popilius, and Cn. Octavius, who were charged with this commission, went first to Thebes, where they very much praised the citizens, and exhorted them to continue firm in their alliance with the Roman people. Proceeding afterwards to the other cities of Peloponnesus, they boasted every where of the lenity and moderation of the senate, which they proved by their late decree in favour of the Greeks. They found great divisions in almost all the cities, especially among the Etolians, occasioned by two factions, which divided them, one for the Romans, and the other for the Macedonians. The assembly of Achaia was not exempt from these divisions; but, the wisdom of the persons of greatest authority, prevented their consequences. The advice of Archon, one of the principal persons of the league, was, to act according to conjunctures, to leave no room for calumny to irritate either of the contending powers against the republic; and, to avoid the misfortunes into which those were fallen, who had not sufficiently comprehended the power of the Romans. This advice prevailed; and, it was resolved, that Archon should be made chief magistrate, and Polybius captain general of the horse.

About this time, Attalus, having something to demand of the Achean league, caused the new magistrate to be sounded; who, determined in favour of the Romans and their allies, promised that prince to support his suit, with all his power. The affair in question was, to have a decree reversed, by which it was ordained, that all the statues of king Eumenes should be removed from the public places. At the first council that was held, the ambassadors of Attalus were introduced to the assembly, who demanded, that in consideration for the prince who sent them, Eumenes, his brother, should be restored to the honours the republic had formerly decreed him. Archon supported this demand, but with great moderation. Polybius spoke with more force, enlarged upon the merit and services of Eumenes, demonstrated the injustice of the first decree, and concluded, that it was proper to repeal it. The whole assembly applauded his discourse, and it was resolved that Eumenes should be restored to all his honours.

^w It was at this time Rome sent Popilius to Antiochus Epiphanes, to prevent his enterprises against Egypt, which we have mentioned before.

The Macedonian war gave the Romans great employment. Q. Marcius Philippus, one of the two consuls lately elected, was charged with it.

Before he set out, Perseus had conceived the design of taking the advantage of the winter to make an expedition against Illyria, which was the only province from whence Macedonia had reason to fear irruptions, during the king's being employed against the Romans. This expedition succeeded very happily for him, and almost without any loss on his side. He began with the siege of Uscana, which had fallen into the hands of the Romans, it is not known how, and took it, after a defence of some duration. He afterwards made himself master of all the strong places in the country, the most part of which had Roman garrisons in them, and took a great number of prisoners.

^w A. M. 3835. Ant. J. C. 169. Liv. l. xliii. n. 11, and 18—23. Polyb. Leg. 76, 77.

Perseus, at the same time, sent ambassadors to Gentius, one of the kings of Illyria, to induce him to quit the party of the Romans, and come over to him. Gentius was far from being averse to it; but, he observed, that having neither munitions of war, nor money, he was in no condition to declare against the Romans; which was explaining himself sufficiently. Perseus, who was avaricious, did not understand, or rather affected not to understand, his demand; and, sent a second embassy to him, without mention of money, and received the same answer. Polybius observes, that this fear of expenses, which denotes a little, mean soul, and entirely dishonours a prince, made many of his enterprises miscarry; and that, if he would have sacrificed certain sums, and those far from considerable, he might have engaged several republics and princes in his party. Can such blindness be conceived in a rational creature! Polybius considers it as a punishment from the gods.

Perseus, having led back his troops into Macedonia, made them march, afterwards to Stratus, a very strong city of Etolia, above the gulph of Ambracia. The people had given him hopes, that they would surrender it as soon as he appeared before the walls; but, the Romans prevented them, and threw succours into the place.

Early in the spring, the consul Marcius left Rome, and went to Thessaly, from whence, without losing time, he advanced into Macedonia, fully assured, that it was necessary to attack Perseus in the heart of his dominions.

* Upon the report that the Roman army was ready to take the field, Archon, chief magistrate of the Achæans, to justify his country from the suspicions and bad reports that had been propagated against it, advised the Achæans to pass a decree, by which it should be ordained, that they should march an army into Thessaly, and share in all the dangers of the war with the Romans. That decree being confirmed, orders were given to Archon to raise troops, and to make all the necessary preparations. It was afterwards resolved, that ambassadors should be sent to the consul, to acquaint him with the resolution of the republic; and, to know from him where and when the Achæan army should join him. Polybius, our historian, with some others, were charged with the embassy. They found the Romans had quitted Thessaly, and were encamped in Perrhebia, between Azora and Dolichea, greatly perplexed about the route it was necessary to take. They followed them for a favourable opportunity of speaking to the consul, and shared with him all the dangers he ran in entering Macedonia.

† Perseus, who did not know what route the consul would take, had posted considerable bodies of troops in two places, by which it was probable he would attempt to pass. For himself, he encamped with the rest of his army near Dium, marching and countermarching without much design.

Marcus, after long deliberation, resolved to pass the forest that covered part of the country, called Octolopha. He had incredible difficulties to surmount, the ways were so steep and impracticable; he therefore seized an eminence, by way of precaution, to favour his passage. From hence the enemy's camp, which was not distant above a thousand paces, and all the country about Dium and Phila, might be discovered; which very much animated the soldiers, who had before their eyes opulent lands, where they hoped to enrich themselves. Hippias, whom the king had posted to defend this pass with a body of twelve thousand men, seeing the eminence possessed by a detachment of the Romans, marched to meet the consul, who advanced with his whole army, harassed his troops for two days, and distressed them very much by frequent attacks. Marcius was in great trouble, not being able either to advance with safety, or retreat without shame, or even danger. He had no other choice to make, but to pursue an undertaking with vigor; formed, perhaps, with too much boldness and temerity, and which could not succeed without a determined perseverance, often crowned in the end with success. It is certain, that if the consul had had to do with the ancient kings of Macedonia, in the narrow defile where his troops were pent up, he would infallibly have received a great blow. But Perseus, instead of sending fresh troops to support Hippias, the cries of whose soldiers in battle he could hear in his camp, and of going in person to attack the enemy, amused himself with making useless excursions with his horse into the country about Dium, and by that neglect gave the Romans opportunity to extricate themselves from the bad affair, in which they had embarked.

* Polyb. Leg. lxxviii.

† Liv. l. xlv. n. 1—10.

It was not without infinite pains they effected this ; the horses laden with the baggage, sinking under their loads, on the declivity of the mountain, and falling down at almost every step they took. The elephants especially, gave them great trouble. It was necessary to find some new means for their descent in such extremely steep places. Having cleared the snow on these descents, they drove two beams into the earth at the lower part of the way, at the distance of something more than the breadth of an elephant from each other. Upon those beams they laid planks of thirty feet in length, and formed a kind of bridge, which they covered with earth. At the end of the first bridge, leaving some interval, they erected a second, then a third, and so on, to as many of the same kind as were necessary. The elephant passed from the firm ground to the bridge, and before he came to the end, they had contrived to lower the beams insensibly, that supported it, and let him gently down with the bridge. He went on in that manner to the second, and all the rest. It is not easy to express the fatigues they underwent in this pass, the soldiers being often obliged to roll upon the ground, because it was impossible for them to keep their legs. It was agreed, that with an handful of men the enemy might have entirely defeated the Roman army. At length, after infinite difficulties and dangers, it arrived in a plain, and found itself out of danger.

2 As the consul seemed then to have entirely overcome the greatest difficulty of his enterprise, Polybius thought this a proper time for presenting Marcius with the decree of the Achæans, and to assure him of their resolution to join him with all their forces, and to share with him in all the labours and dangers of this war. Marcius, after having thanked the Achæans for their good will in the kindest terms, told them, they might spare themselves the trouble and expense that war would give them ; that, he would dispense with both ; and that, in the present posture of affairs, he had no occasion for the aid of the allies. After this discourse, Polybius's colleagues returned into Achaia.

Polybius only continued in the Roman army, till the consul having received advice that Appius, surnamed Cento, had demanded of the Achæans a body of five thousand men, to be sent him into Epirus, despatched him home, with advice, not to suffer his republic to furnish those troops, or engage in expenses entirely unnecessary, as Appius had no reason to demand that aid. It is difficult, says the historian, to discover the real motives that induced Marcius to talk in this manner. Was he for sparing the Achæans, or laying a snare for them ; or did he intend to put it out of Appius's power, to undertake any thing ?

While the king was bathing, he was informed of the enemy's approach. That news alarmed him terribly. Uncertain what choice to make, and changing, every moment, his resolution, he cried out, and lamented his being conquered, without fighting. He recalled the two officers, to whom he had confided the defence of the passes ; sent the gilt statues^a at Diium on board his fleet, lest they should fall into the hands of the Romans ; gave orders that his treasures laid up at Pella, should be thrown into the sea, and all his galleys at Thessalonica burned. For himself, he retired to Pydna.

^a These were the statues of the horse soldiers killed in passing the Granicus, which Alexander had caused to be made by Lysippus, and to be set up in Diium.

The consul had brought the army to a place from whence it was impossible to disengage himself without the enemy's permission. There was no passing for him, but by two forests ; by the one he might penetrate through the valleys of Tempe into Thessaly, and by the other, beyond Dium, enter farther into Macedonia ; and both these important posts were possessed by strong garrisons for the king. So that, if Perseus had only staid ten days, without taking fright, it had been impossible for the Romans to have entered Thessaly, by Tempe, and the consul would have had no pass for provisions to him ; for the ways through Tempe are bordered by such vast precipices, that the eye could scarce sustain the view of them without dazzling. The king's troops guarded this pass at four several places, of which the last was so narrow, that ten men, well armed, could alone have defended the entrance. The Romans, therefore, not being able either to receive provisions by the narrow passes of Tempe, nor to get through them, must have been obliged to regain the mountains, from whence they came down, which was become impracticable, the enemy, having possessed themselves of the eminences. The only choice they had left, was to open their way through their enemies to Dium in Macedonia, which^b would have been no less difficult, if the gods, says Livy, had not deprived Perseus of prudence and counsel; for, in making a fosse with intrenchments in a very narrow defile, at the foot of mount Olympus, he would have absolutely shut them out, and stopped them short; but, in the blindness, into which his fear had thrown the king, he neither saw, nor did, any thing of all the means in his power to save himself; left all the passes of his kingdom open and unguarded, and took refuge at Pydna with precipitation.

The consul perceived aright, that he owed his safety to the king's timidity and imprudence. He ordered the pretor Lucretius, who was at Larissa, to seize the posts bordering upon Tempe, which Perseus had abandoned, to secure a retreat, in case of accident; and sent Popilius to take a view of the passes in the way to Dium. When he was informed that the ways were open and unguarded, he marched thither in two days, and encamped his army near the temple of Jupiter, in the neighbourhood, to prevent its being plundered. Having entered the city, which was full of magnificent buildings, and well fortified, he was exceedingly surprised that the king had abandoned it so easily. He continued his march, and made himself master of several places, almost without any resistance. But the farther he advanced, the less provisions he found, and the more the dearth increased; which obliged him to return to Dium. He was also reduced to quit that city, and retire to Phila, where the pretor Lucretius had informed him he might find provisions in abundance. His quitting Dium suggested to Perseus, that it was now time to recover by his courage, what he had lost by his fear. He repossessed himself therefore, of that city, and soon repaired its ruins. Popilius, on his side, besieged and took Heraclea, which was only a quarter of a league distant from Phila.

^b Quod nisi dii mentem regi ademissent, ipsum ingentis difficultatis erat. Liv.

Perseus, having recovered his fright, and resumed spirit, would have been very glad that his orders to throw his treasures, at Pella, into the sea, and burn all his ships at Thessalonica, had not been executed. Andronicus, to whom he had given the latter order, had delayed obeying it, to give time for the repentance which might soon follow that command, as, indeed, it happened. Nicias, less aware, had thrown all the money he found at Pella into the sea. But his fault was soon repaired by divers, who brought up almost the whole money from the bottom of the sea. To reward their services, the king caused them all to be put to death secretly, as he did Andronicus and Nicias; so much was he ashamed of the abject terror to which he had abandoned himself, that he could not bear to have any witnesses or traces of it in being.

Several expeditions passed on both sides by sea and land, which were neither of much consequence or importance.

° When Polybius returned from his embassy into Peloponnesus, Appius's letter, in which he demanded

° Polyb. Leg. lxxviii.

five thousand men, had been received there. Some time after, the council assembled at Sicyon, to deliberate upon that affair, and gave Polybius great perplexity. Not to execute the order he received from Marcius, had been an inexcusable fault. On the other side, it was dangerous to refuse the Romans the troops they might have occasion for, of which the Achæans were in no want. To extricate themselves in so delicate a conjuncture, they had recourse to the decree of the Roman senate, that prohibited their having any regard to the letters of the generals, unless an order of the senate was annexed to them, which Appius had not sent with his. It was his opinion, therefore, that before any thing was sent to Appius, it was necessary to inform the consul of his demand, and to wait for his decision upon it. By that means Polybius saved the Achæans the sum of one hundred and twenty thousand crowns at least.

^d In the mean time arrived ambassadors at Rome, from Prusias, king of Bithynia, and also from the Rhodians, in favour of Perseus. The former expressed themselves very modestly, declaring that Prusias had constantly adhered to the Roman party, and should continue to do so during the war; but that, having promised Perseus to employ his good offices for him with the Romans, in order to obtain a peace, he desired, if it were possible, that they would grant him that favour, and make such use of his mediation as they should think convenient. The language of the Rhodians was very different. After having set forth, in a lofty style, the services they had done the Roman people, and ascribed to themselves the greatest share in the victories they had obtained, and especially in that over Antiochus, they added, that whilst the peace subsisted between the Macedonians and Romans, they had negotiated a treaty of alliance with Perseus ; that they had suspended it against their will, and without any subject of complaint on the king's part, because it had pleased the Romans to engage them on their side ; that for three years, which this war had continued, they had suffered many inconveniences from it ; that their trade by sea being interrupted, the island found itself in great straits, from the reduction of its revenues, and other advantages arising from commerce ; that being no longer able to support such considerable losses. they had sent ambassadors into Macedonia, to king Perseus, to inform him that the Rhodians thought it necessary that he should make peace with the Romans, and that they were also sent to Rome to make the same declaration ; that if either of the parties refused to come into so reasonable a proposal, the Rhodians should know what they had to do.

^d Liv. l. xliv. n. 14—16.

It is easy to judge in what manner so vain and presumptuous a discourse was received. Some historians tell us, all the answer that was given to it was, to order a decree of the senate, whereby the Carians and Lycians were declared free, to be read in their presence. This was touching them to the quick, and mortifying them in the most sensible part ; for they pretended to an authority over both those people. Others say, the senate answered in few words, that the disposition of the Rhodians and their secret intrigues with Perseus, had been long known at Rome ; that when the Roman people should have conquered him, of which they expected advice every day, they should know in their turn what they had to do, and should then treat their allies according to their respective merits. They made the ambassadors, however, the usual presents.

The consul Q. Marcius's letter was then read, in which he gave an account of the manner he had entered Macedonia, after having suffered incredible difficulties in passing a very narrow defile. He added, that, by the wise precautions of the pretor, he had sufficient provisions for the whole winter ; having received from the Epirots, twenty thousand measures of wheat, and ten thousand of barley, for which it was necessary to pay their ambassadors then at Rome. That it was necessary to send him clothes for the soldiers ; that he wanted two hundred horses, especially from Numidia, because there were none of that kind in the country where he was. All these articles were exactly and immediately executed.

After this, they gave audience to Onesimus, a Macedonian nobleman. He had always advised the king to observe the peace ; and, putting him in mind that his father Philip, to the last day of his life, had caused his treaty with the Romans to be constantly read to him twice every day, he had admonished him to do as much, if not with the same regularity, at least from time to time. Not being able to dissuade him from the war, he had begun, by withdrawing himself from his counsels, under different pretexts, that he might not be witness to resolutions taken in them, which he could not approve. At length, seeing himself become suspected, and tacitly considered as a traitor, he had taken refuge among the Romans, and had been of great service to the consul. Having made this relation to the senate, they gave him a very favourable reception, and provided magnificently for his subsistence.

SECTION IV.

EMILIUS'S CELEBRATED VICTORY NEAR THE CITY OF PYDNA.
PERSEUS TAKEN PRISONER, WITH ALL HIS CHILDREN.

* THE time for the comitia, or assemblies, to elect consuls at Rome, approaching, all the world were anxious to know upon whom so important a choice would fall, and nothing else was talked of in all conversations. They were not satisfied with the consuls, who had been employed for three years against Perseus, and had very ill sustained the honour of the Roman name. They called to mind the famous victories formerly obtained against his father Philip, who had been obliged to sue for peace, against Antiochus, who was driven beyond mount Taurus, and forced to pay a great tribute; and, what was still more considerable, against Hannibal, the greatest general that had ever appeared as their enemy, or perhaps in the world, whom they had reduced to quit Italy, after a war of more than sixteen years continuance, and conquered in his own country, almost under the very walls of Carthage. The formidable preparations of Perseus, and some advantages gained by him in the former campaigns, augmented the apprehension of the Romans. They plainly distinguished, that it was no time to confer the command of the armies by faction or favour ; and, that it was necessary to choose a general for his wisdom, valor, and experience ; in a word, one capable of presiding in so important a war as that now upon their hands.

* A. M. 3836. Ant. J. C. 168. Liv. l. xlv. n. 17. Plut. in Paul. Æm. p. 259, 260.

All the world cast their eyes upon Paulus Emilius. There are times when distinguished merit unites the voices of the public ; and nothing is more affecting than such a judgment, founded upon the knowledge of a man's past services, the army's opinion of his capacity, and the state's pressing occasion for his valor and conduct. Paulus Emilius was near sixty years old ; but age, without impairing his faculties in the least, had rather improved them with maturity of wisdom and judgment ; more necessary in a general than even valor and bravery. He had been consul thirteen years before, and had acquired the general esteem during his administration. But the people repaid his services with ingratitude, having refused to raise him again to the same dignity, though he had solicited it with sufficient ardour. For several years he had led a private and retired life, solely employed in the education of his children, in which no father ever succeeded better, nor was more gloriously rewarded for his care. All his relations, all his friends, made instances to him to comply with the people's wishes, in taking upon him the consulship ; but believing himself no longer capable of commanding, he avoided appearing in public, kept himself at home, and shunned honours with as much solicitude as others generally pursue them. However, when he saw the people assemble every morning in crowds before his door; that they summoned him to the forum, and exclaimed highly against his obstinate refusal to serve his country, he gave in at last to their remonstrances, and appearing among those who aspired to that dignity, he seemed less to receive the command of the army, than to give the people the assurance of an approaching and complete victory. The consulship was conferred upon him unanimously, and, according to Plutarch, the command of the army in Macedonia, decreed to him in preference to his colleague, though Livy says it fell to him by lot.

It is said, that the day he was elected general in the war against Perseus, at his return home, attended by all the people, who followed to do him honour, he found his daughter Tertia, at that time a little infant, who, on seeing him, fell a crying bitterly. He embraced, and asked her the cause of her tears. Tertia, hugging him with her little arms, "You do not know, then," said she, "that our Perseus is dead, papa." She spoke of a little dog she had brought up, called Perseus. "And at a very good time, my dear child," said Paulus Emilius, struck with the word, "I accept this omen with joy." The ancients carried their superstition upon this kind of fortuitous circumstances very high.

^f The manner in which Paulus Emilius prepared for the war he was charged with, gave room to judge of the success to be expected from it. He demanded, first, that commissioners should be sent into Macedonia to inspect the army and fleet, and to make their report, after an exact inquiry, of the number of troops which were necessary to be added, both by sea and land. They were also to inform themselves, as near as possible, of the number of the king's forces; where they and the Romans actually lay; if the latter were actually encamped in the forests, or had entirely passed them, and were arrived in the plain; upon which of the allies they might rely for certainty; which of them were dubious and wavering; and, who they might regard as declared enemies; for how long time they had provisions, and from whence they might be supplied with them, either by land or water; what had passed during the last campaign, either in the army by land, or in the fleet. As an able and experienced general, he thought it necessary to be fully apprized in all these circumstances; convinced that the plan of the campaign, upon which he was about to enter, could not be formed, nor its operations concerted, without a perfect knowledge of them. The senate approved these wise measures very much, and appointed commissioners, with the approbation of Paulus Emilius, who set out two days after.

^f Liv. l. xliv. n. 18—22. Plut. in Paul. Æmil. p. 260.

During their absence, audience was given the ambassadors from Ptolemy and Cleopatra, king and queen of Egypt, who brought complaints to Rome of the unjust enterprises of Antiochus, king of Syria, which have been before related.

The commissioners had made good use of their time. Upon their return, they reported, that Marcius had forced the passes of Macedonia, to get entrance into the country, but with more danger than utility ; that the king was advanced into Pieria, and in actual possession of it ; that the two camps were very near each other, being separated only by the river Enipeus ; that the king avoided a battle, and that the Roman army was neither in a condition to oblige him to fight, nor to force his lines ; that, to the other inconveniences, a very severe winter had happened, from which they could not but suffer exceedingly in a mountainous country, and be entirely prevented from acting ; and, that they had only provisions for six days ; that the army of the Macedonians was supposed to amount to thirty thousand men ; that, if Appius Claudius had been sufficiently strong in the neighbourhood of Lychnidus in Illyria, he might have acted with good effect against king Gentius ; but, that Claudius and his troops, were actually in great danger, unless a considerable reinforcement was immediately sent him, or he ordered directly to quit the post he was in. That after having visited the camp, they had repaired to the fleet ; that they had been told, that part of the crews were dead of diseases ; that the rest of the allies, especially those of Sicily, were returned home ; and, that the fleet was entirely in want of seamen and soldiers ; that those who remained had not received their pay, and had no clothes ; that Eumenes and his fleet, after having just shown themselves, disappeared immediately, without any visible cause ; and, that it seemed his inclinations neither could nor ought to be relied on ; but that, as for his brother Attalus, his good will was not to be doubted.

Upon this report of the commissioners, after Paulus Emilius had given his opinion, the senate decreed, that he should set forward without loss of time for Macedonia, with the pretor Cn. Octavius, who had the command of the fleet, and L. Anicius, another pretor, who was to succeed Ap. Claudius in his post near Lychnidus in Illyria. The number of troops each of them was to command, was regulated in the following manner.

The troops of which the army of Paulus Emilius consisted, amounted to twenty five thousand eight hundred men; that is, of two Roman legions, each composed of six thousand foot, and three hundred horse; as many of the infantry of the Italian allies, and twice the number of horse. He had, besides, six hundred horse raised in Gallia Cisalpina, and some auxiliary troops from the allies of Greece and Asia. The whole, in all probability, did not amount to thirty thousand men. The pretor Anicius had also two legions; but they consisted of only five thousand foot, and three hundred horse each; which, with ten thousand of the Italian allies, and eight hundred horse, composed the army under him of twenty one thousand two hundred men. The troops that served on board the fleet were five thousand men. These three bodies together made fifty six thousand two hundred men.

As the war which they were preparing to make this year in Macedonia, seemed of the last consequence, all precautions were taken that might conduce to the success of it. The consul and people had the choice of the tribunes who were to serve in it, and each commanded in his turn, an entire legion. It was decreed, that none should be elected into this employment, but such as had already served ; and Paulus Emilius was left at liberty to choose out of all the tribunes, such as he approved for his army. He had twelve for the two legions.

It must be allowed the Romans acted with great wisdom upon this occasion. They had, as we have seen, unanimously chosen consul and general, the person among them who was indisputably the greatest captain of his time. They had resolved that no officers should be raised to the post of tribune, but such as were distinguished by their merit, experience, and capacity, instanced in real service ; advantages that are not always the effect of birth or seniority ; to which, indeed, the Romans paid little or no regard. They did more ; by a particular exception, compatible with republican government, Paulus Emilius was left at entire liberty to choose such of the tribunes as he thought fit, well knowing the great importance of a perfect union between the general and the officers who serve under him, in order to the exact and punctual execution of the commands of the former, who is, in a manner, the soul of the army, and ought to direct all its motions, which cannot be done without the best understanding between them, founded in a passion for the public good, with which neither interest, jealousy, nor ambition, are capable of interfering.

After all these regulations were made, the consul Paulus Emilius repaired from the senate to the assembly of the people, to whom he spoke in this manner ; “ You seem to me, Romans, to have expressed more joy when Macedonia fell to my lot, than when I was elected consul, or entered upon that office ; and, to me your joy seemed to be occasioned by the hopes you conceived, that I should put an end, worthy of the grandeur and reputation of the Roman people, to a war, which, in your opinion, has already been of too long continuance. I have reason to believe, that the same gods,^s who have occasioned Macedonia to fall to my lot, will also assist me with their protection in conducting and terminating this war successfully ; but, of this I may venture to assure you, that I shall do my utmost not to fall short of your expectations. The senate has wisely regulated every thing necessary in the expedition I am charged with ; and, as I am ordered to set out immediately, I shall make no delay, and know that my colleague, C. Licinius, out of his great zeal for the public service, will raise and march off the troops appointed for me, with as much ardour and expedition, as if they were for himself. I shall take care to remit to you, as well as to the senate, an exact account of all that passes ; and you may rely upon the certainty and truth of my letters ; but I beg of you, as a great favour, that you will not give credit to, or lay any weight out of credulity, upon the light reports, which are frequently spread abroad without any author. I perceive well, that in this war, more than any other, whatever resolution people may form to obviate these rumours, they will not fail to make impression, and inspire I know not what discouragement. There are those, who, in company, and even at table, command armies, make dispositions, and prescribe all the operations of the campaign. They know better than we, where we should encamp, and what posts it is necessary for us to seize ; at what time, and by what defile, we ought to enter Macedonia ; where it is proper to have magazines ; from whence, either by sea or land, we are to bring provisions ; when we are to fight the enemy, and when lie still. They not only prescribe what is best to do, but for deviating ever so little from their plans, they make it a crime in their consul, and cite him before their tribunal. But know, Romans, this is of very bad effect with your generals. All have not the resolution and constancy of Fabius, to despise impertinent reports. He could choose rather to suffer the people, upon such unhappy rumours, to invade his authority, than to ruin affairs in order to preserve their opinion, and an empty name. I am far from believing, that generals stand in no need of advice ; I think, on the contrary, that whoever would conduct every thing alone, upon his own opinion, and without counsel, shows more presumption than prudence. But, some may ask, how then shall we act reasonably ? In not suffering any persons to obtrude their advice upon your generals, but such as are, in the first place, versed in the art of war, and have learned, from experience, what it is to command ; and, in the second, who are upon the spot, who know the enemy, are witnesses in person to all that passes, and sharers with us in all dangers. If there be any one, who conceives himself capable of assisting me with his counsels in the war you have charged me with, let him not refuse to do the republic that service, but let him go with me into Macedonia ; ships, horses, tents, provisions, shall all be supplied him at my charge. But, if he will not take so much trouble, and prefers the tranquillity of the city to the dangers and fatigues of the field, let him not take upon him to hold the helm and continue idle in the port. The city of itself supplies sufficient matter of discourse on other subjects ; but, as for these, let it be silent upon them, and know, that we shall pay no regard to any counsels, but such as shall be given us in the camp itself.”

^s It was a received opinion, in all ages and nations, that the divinity presides over chance.

This discourse of Paulus Emilius, which abounds with reason and good sense, shows that men are the same in all ages of the world. People have an incredible itch for examining, criticising, and condemning the conduct of generals, and do not observe, that doing so is a manifest contradiction to reason and justice ; to reason, for what can be more absurd and ridiculous, than to see persons, without any knowledge or experience in war, set themselves up for censors of the most able generals, and pronounce with a magisterial air upon their actions? To justice, for the most experienced can make no certain judgment without being upon the spot ; the least circumstance of time, place, disposition of the troops, secret orders not divulged, being capable of making an absolute change in the general rules of conduct. But we must not expect to see a failing reformed, that has its source in the curiosity and vanity of human nature ; and, generals would do wisely, after the example of Paulus Emilius, to despise these city reports, and crude opinions of idle people, who have nothing else to do, and have generally as little judgment as business.

^k Paulus Emilius, after having discharged, according to custom, the duties of religion, set out for Macedonia, with the pretor Cn. Octavius, to whom the command of the fleet had been allotted.

Whilst they were employed in making preparations for the war at Rome, Perseus, on his side, had not been asleep. The fear of the approaching danger which threatened him, having at length got the better of his avarice, he agreed to give Gentius, king of Illyria, three hundred talents in money, that is, three hundred thousand crowns, and purchased his alliance at that price.

He sent ambassadors at the same time to Rhodes, convinced that if that island, very powerful at that time by sea, should embrace his party, Rome would be very much embarrassed. He sent deputies also to Eumenes and Antiochus, two very potent kings, and capable of giving him great aid. Perseus did wisely in having recourse to these measures, and in endeavouring to strengthen himself by such supports; but he entered upon them too late. He ought to have begun by taking those steps, and to have made them the first foundations of his enterprise. He did not think of putting those remote powers in motion, till he was reduced almost to extremity, and his affairs next to absolutely desperate. It was rather calling in spectators and associates of his ruin, than aids and supports. The instructions which he gave his ambassadors, were very solid and persuasive, as we are about to see; but he should have made use of them three years sooner, and have waited their event, before he embarked, almost alone, in the war against so powerful a people, with so many resources in case of misfortune.

^k Liv. l. xliv. n. 23—29. Polyb. Leg. lxxxv. lxxxvii. Plut. in Paul. Emil. p. 260, 261.

The ambassadors had the same instructions for both those kings. They represented to them, that there was a natural enmity between republics and monarchies ; that the Roman people attacked the kings one after another, and what added extremely to the indignity, that they employed the forces of the kings themselves to ruin them, one after another ; that they had crushed his father by the assistance of Attalus ; that by the aid of Eumenes, and in some measure, by that of his father Philip, Antiochus had been subjected, and that at present they had armed Eumenes and Prusias against himself ; that after the kingdom of Macedonia should be destroyed, Asia would be the next to experience the same fate, of which they had already usurped a part, under the specious colour of reestablishing the cities in their ancient liberty ; and that Syria's turn would soon follow ; that they had already begun to prefer Prusias to Eumenes by particular distinctions of honour, and had deprived Antiochus of the fruits of his victories in Egypt. Perseus requested of them, either to incline the Romans to give Macedonia peace, or, if they persevered in the unjust design of continuing the war, to regard them as the common enemy of all kings. The ambassadors treated with Antiochus openly, and without any reserve.

In regard to Eumenes, they covered their voyage with the pretext of ransoming prisoners, and treated only in secret upon the real cause of it. There had passed already several conferences, at different times and places, upon the same subject, which had begun to render that prince very much suspected by the Romans. It was not because Eumenes desired at bottom, that Perseus should be victorious against the Romans; the enormous power he would then have had, would have given him umbrage, and highly alarmed his jealousy; neither was he more willing to declare openly against, or to make war upon him. But, in hopes to see the two parties equally inclined to peace; Perseus, from his fear of the misfortunes which might befall him; the Romans, from being weary of a war, spun out to too great a length; he desired to become the mediator of a peace between them, and to make Perseus purchase his mediation, or at least his inaction and neutrality at a high price. That was already agreed upon, and was fifteen hundred talents, one million five hundred thousand crowns. The only difference that remained, was in settling the time for the payment of that sum. Perseus was for waiting till the service took effect, and in the mean time offered to deposit the money in Samothracia. Eumenes did not believe himself secure in that, because Samothracia depended on Perseus, and therefore he insisted upon immediate payment of part of the money. This broke up the treaty.

He failed likewise in another negotiation, which might have been no less in his favour. He had caused a body of Gauls to come from the other side of the Danube, consisting of ten thousand horse, and as many foot, and had agreed to give ten pieces of gold to each horseman, five to the infantry, and one thousand to their captains. I have observed above, that these Gauls had taken the name of Bastarnæ. When he received advice that they were arrived upon the frontiers of his dominions, he went to meet them with half his troops, and gave orders, that in the towns and villages, through which they were to pass, great quantities of corn, wine, and cattle, should be provided for them ; he had presents for their principal officers, of horses, arms, and habits ; to these he added some money, which was to be distributed amongst a small number ; he imagined to gain the multitude by this bait. The king halted near the river Axius, where he encamped with his troops. He deputed Antigonus, one of the Macedonian lords, to the Gauls, who were about thirty leagues distant from him. Antigonus was astonished when he saw men of prodigious stature, skilful in all the exercises of the body, and in handling their arms, and haughty and audacious in their language, which abounded with menaces and bravadoes. He set off, in the best terms, the orders his master had given for their good reception wherever they passed, and the presents he had prepared for them ; after which he invited them to advance to a certain place he mentioned, and to send their principal officers to the king. The Gauls were not a people to be paid with words. Clondicus, the general and king of these strangers, came directly to the point, and asked whether he had brought the sum agreed on. As no answer was given to that question, "Go," said he, "and let your prince know, that till he sends the hostages and sums agreed on, the Gauls will not stir from hence." The king, upon the return of his deputy, assembled his council. He foresaw what they would advise ; but as he was a much better guardian of his money than of his kingdom, to disguise his avarice, he enlarged a great deal upon the perfidy and ferocity of the Gauls ; adding, that it would be dangerous to give such numbers of them entrance into Macedonia, from which every thing was to be feared, and that five thousand horse would suffice for him. Every body perceived that his sole apprehension was for his money ; but no body dared to contradict him. Antigonus returned to the Gauls, and told them his master had occasion for no more than five thousand horse ; upon which they raised an universal cry and murmur against Perseus, who had made them come so far to insult them so grossly. Clondicus having asked Antigonus again, whether he had brought the money for the five thousand horse ; as the deputy sought evasions, and gave no direct answers, the Gauls grew furious, and were just going to cut him in pieces, as he violently apprehended. However, they had a regard to his quality of deputy, and dismissed him without any ill treatment to his person. The Gauls marched away immediately, resumed their route to the Danube, and plundered Thrace in their way home.

Perseus, with so considerable a reinforcement, might have given the Romans great trouble. He could have detached those Gauls into Thessaly, where they might have plundered the country, and taken the strongest places. By that means, remaining quiet about the river Enipeus, he might have put it out of the power of the Romans, either to have penetrated into Macedonia, of which he might have barred the entrance with his troops, or to have subsisted any longer in the country, because they could have brought no provisions as before from Thessaly, which would have been entirely laid waste. The avarice, by which he was governed, prevented his making any use of so great an advantage.

The same vice made him lose another of the same nature. Urged by the condition of his affairs, and the extreme danger that threatened him, he had at length consented to give Gentius the three hundred talents he had demanded above a year, for raising troops, and fitting out a fleet. Pantauchus had negotiated this treaty for the king of Macedonia, and had begun by paying the king of Illyria, ten talents, ten thousand crowns, in part of the sum promised him. Gentius despatched his ambassadors, and with them persons he could confide in, to receive the money. He directed them also, when all should be concluded, to join Perseus's ambassadors, and to go with them to Rhodes, in order to bring that republic into an alliance with them. Pantauchus had represented to him, that if the Rhodians came into it, Rome would not be able to make head against the three powers united. Perseus received those ambassadors with all possible marks of distinction. After the exchange of hostages, and the taking of oaths on both sides, it only remained to deliver the three hundred talents. The ambassadors and agents of the Illyrian repaired to Pella, where the money was told down to them, and put into chests, under the seal of the ambassadors, to be conveyed into Illyria. Perseus had given orders underhand to the persons charged with this convoy, to march slowly, and by small journies, and when they arrived upon the frontiers of Macedonia, to stop for his further orders. During all this time, Pantauchus, who had remained at the court of Illyria, made pressing instances to the king, to declare against the Romans by some act of hostility. In the mean while arrived ambassadors from the Romans, to negotiate an alliance with Gentius. He had already received ten talents by way of earnest, and advice that the whole sum was upon the road. Upon the repeated solicitations of Pantauchus, in violation of all rights human and divine, he caused the two ambassadors to be imprisoned, under pretence that they were spies. As soon as Perseus had received this news, believing him sufficiently and irretrievably engaged against the Romans by so glaring an act, he recalled those who carried the three hundred talents; congratulating himself in secret upon the good success of his perfidy, and his great dexterity in saving his money. But he did not see that he only kept it in reserve for the victor; whereas he ought to have employed it in defending himself against him, and to conquer him, according to the maxim of Philip and his son Alexander, the most illustrious of his predecessors, who used to say, "that victory should be purchased with money, and not money, saved at the expense of victory."

The ambassadors of Perseus and Gentius met with a favourable reception at Rhodes. A decree was imparted to them, by which the republic had resolved to employ all their credit and power to oblige the two parties to make peace, and to declare war against that which should refuse to accept proposals for an accommodation.

The Roman generals had each of them repaired to their posts in the beginning of the spring ; the consul to Macedonia, Octavius to Orea, with the fleet, and Anicius into Illyria.

The success of the last was as rapid as fortunate. He was to carry on the war against Gentius, and put an end to it before it was known at Rome that it was begun. Its duration was only of thirty days. Having treated Scorda, the capital of the country, which had surrendered to him, with great moderation, the other cities soon followed its example. Gentius himself was reduced to come and throw himself at Anicius's feet to implore his mercy ; confessing with tears in his eyes, his fault, or rather folly, in having abandoned the party of the Romans. The pretor treated him with humanity. His first care was to take the two ambassadors out of prison. He sent one of them, named Perpenna, to Rome, to carry the news of his victory, and some days after caused Gentius to be conducted thither, with his wife, children, brother, and the principal lords of the country. The sight of such illustrious prisoners, very much augmented the people's joy. Public thanksgivings were made to the gods, and the temples crowded with a vast concourse of persons of all sexes and ages.

When Paulus Emilius approached the enemy, he found Perseus encamped near the sea, at the foot of the mountain Olympus, in places which seemed inaccessible. He had the Enipeus in front, whose banks were very high ; and on the side where he lay, he had thrown up good intrenchments, with towers from space to space, on which were placed balistæ, and other machines for discharging darts and stones upon the enemy, if they ventured to approach. Perseus had fortified himself in such a manner, as made him believe himself entirely secure, and gave him hopes to weaken, and at last repulse, Paulus Emilius by length of time, and the difficulties he would find to subsist his troops, and maintain his ground, in a country already eaten up by the enemy.

He did not know what kind of adversary he had to cope with. Paulus Emilius employed his thoughts solely in preparing every thing for action, and was continually meditating expedients and measures for executing some enterprise with success. He began by establishing an exact and severe discipline in his army, which he found corrupted by the license wherein it had been suffered to live. He reformed several things, as well with regard to the arms of the troops, as the duty of sentinels. It had been a custom amongst the soldiers to criticise upon their general, to examine all his actions among themselves, to prescribe his conduct, and to explain upon what he should or should not do. He spoke to them with resolution and dignity. He gave them to understand, that such discourses did not become a soldier; that he ought to make only three things his business; the care of his body, in order to render it robust and active; that of his arms, to keep them always clean and in good condition; and of his provisions,ⁱ that he might be always in a readiness to march upon the first notice ; that, for the rest, he ought to rely upon the goodness of the immortal gods, and the vigilance of his general ; that, for himself, he should omit nothing that might be necessary to give them occasion to evidence their valor, and that they had only to take care to do their duty well when the signal was given them.

ⁱ The Roman soldiers sometimes carried provisions for ten or twelve days.

It is incredible how much they were animated by this discourse. The old soldiers declared that they had never known their duty aright till that day. A surprising change was immediately observed in the camp. No body was idle in it. The soldiers were seen sharpening their swords, polishing their helmets, cuirasses, and shields ; practising an active motion under their arms ; whirling their javelins, and brandishing their naked swords ; in short, forming and inuring themselves in all military exercises ; so that it was easy to foresee, that upon the first opportunity they should have of coming to blows with the enemy, they were determined to conquer or die.

The camp was situated very commodiously, but wanted water, which was a great inconvenience to the army. Paulus Emilius whose thoughts extended to every thing, seeing mount Olympus before him very high, and covered all over with trees extremely green and flourishing, judged, from the quantity and quality of those trees, that there must be springs of water in the caverns of the mountain, and at the same time ordered openings to be made at the foot of it, and pits to be dug in the sand. The surface ^k was scarce broke up, when springs of water were seen to run, muddy at first, and in small quantities, but in a little while very clear, and in great abundance. This event though natural, was looked upon by the soldiers as a singular favour of the gods, who had taken Paulus Emilius under their protection, and made him more beloved and respected by them than before.

^k Vix deducta summa arena erat, cum scaturigenes turbidæ primo et tenues emicare, dein liquidam multamque fundere aquam, velut deum dono, cœperunt. Aliquantum ea quoque res duci famæ et auctoritatis apud milites adjecit. Liv.

When Perseus saw what passed in the Roman camp, the ardour of the soldiers, their active behaviour, and the various exercises by which they prepared themselves for combat, he began to be greatly disquieted, and perceived plainly, that he had no longer to deal with a Licinius, an Hostilius, or a Marcius; and that the Roman army was entirely altered with the general. He redoubled his attention and application on his side, animated his soldiers, employed himself in forming them by different exercises, added new works to the old, and used all means to put his camp out of danger of insult.

In the mean time came the news of the victory in Illyria, and of the taking of the king with all his family. This caused incredible joy in the Roman army, and excited among the soldiers an inexpressible ardour to signalize themselves also on their side; for it is common, when two armies act in different parts, for the one to be unwilling to give place to the other, either in valor or glory. Perseus endeavoured at first to suppress this news; but his care to dissemble it, only served to make it more public and certain. The alarm was general amongst his troops, who apprehended the same fate.

At this time arrived the Rhodian ambassadors, who came to make the same proposals to the army in regard to peace, that at Rome had so highly offended the senate. It is easy to judge in what manner they were received in the camp. Some, in the height of their anger, were for having them dismissed with insult. The consul thought the best way to express his contempt for them, was to reply coldly, that he would give them an answer in fifteen days.

To show how little he made of the pacific mediation of the Rhodians, he assembled his council to deliberate upon the means of entering upon action. It is probable that the Roman army, which the year before had penetrated into Macedonia, had quitted it and returned into Thessaly; perhaps upon account of provisions; for, at present, they consulted upon measures for opening a passage into Macedonia. Some, and those the oldest officers, were for attempting to force the enemy's intrenchments upon the banks of the Enipeus. They observed, that the Macedonians, who the year before had been driven from higher and better fortified places, could not sustain the charge of the Roman legions. Others were of opinion that Octavius with the fleet, should go to Thessalonica, and attack the sea coasts, in order to oblige the king, by that diversion, to detach part of his troops from the Enipeus, for the defence of his country, and thereby leave the passage open. It is highly important for an able and experienced general to have it in his power to choose what measures he pleases. Paulus Emilius had quite different views. He saw that the Enipeus, as well from its natural situation, as the fortifications which had been added to it, was inaccessible. He knew besides, without mentioning the machines disposed on all sides, that the enemy's troops were much more expert than his own in discharging javelins and darts. To undertake the forcing of such impenetrable lines as those were, had been to expose his troops to inevitable slaughter; and a good general spares the blood of his soldiers, because he looks upon himself as their father, and believes it his duty to preserve them as his children. He kept quiet therefore, for some days, without making the least motion. Plutarch says, that it was believed there never was an example of two armies so numerous, that lay so long in the presence of each other, in such profound peace, and so perfect a tranquillity. In any other times the soldiers would have murmured out of ardour and impatience; but Paulus Emilius had taught them to acquiesce in the conduct of their leader.

At length, after diligent inquiry, and using all means for information, he was told by two Perrhebian merchants, whose prudence and fidelity he had experienced, that there was a way through Perrhebia, which led to Pythium, a town situated upon the brow of mount Olympus;¹ that this way was not of difficult access, but was well guarded. Perseus had sent thither a detachment of five thousand men. He conceived, that in causing this post, to be attacked in the night, and at unawares, by good troops, the enemy might be beat out, and he take possession of it. It was necessary, therefore, to amuse the enemy, and to conceal his real design. He sent for the pretor Octavius, and having opened himself to him, he ordered him to go with his fleet to Heraclea, and to take ten days provisions with him for one thousand men, in order to make Perseus believe that he was going to ravage the sea coasts. At the same time he made his son Fabius Maximus, then very young, with Scipio Nasica, the son in law of Scipio Africanus, set out; he gave them a detachment of five thousand chosen troops, and ordered them to march by the sea side towards Heraclea, as if they were to embark there, according to what had been proposed in the council. When they arrived there, the pretor told them the consul's orders. As soon as it was night, quitting their rout by the sea coast, they advanced, without halting, towards Pythium, over the mountains and rocks, conducted by the two Perrhebian guides. It had been concluded that they should arrive there the third day, before it was light.

¹ The perpendicular height of the mountain Olympus, where Pythium was situated, was upwards of ten stadia, or half a league.

In the mean time Paulus Emilius, to amuse the enemy, and prevent his having any other thoughts, the next day in the morning, detached his light armed troops, as if he intended to attack the Macedonians. They came to a slight engagement in the course of the river itself, which was then very low. The banks on each side, from the top to the bed of the river, had a declivity of three hundred paces, and the stream was one thousand paces broad. The action passed in the sight of the king and consul, who were each with his troops in the front of their camps. The consul caused the retreat to be sounded towards noon. The loss was almost equal on both sides. The next day the battle was renewed in the same manner, and almost at the same hour; but it was warmer, and continued longer. The Romans had not only those upon their hands with whom they fought; the enemy, from the tops of the towers upon the banks, poured clouds of darts and stones upon them. The consul lost abundance more of his people this day, and made them retire late. The third day Paulus Emilius lay still, and seemed to design to attempt a passage near the sea. Perseus did not suspect in the least the danger that threatened him.

Scipio arrived in the night of the third day near Pythium. His troops were very much fatigued, for which reason he made them rest themselves the remainder of the night. Perseus in the mean time was very quiet; but, on a sudden, a Cretan deserter, who had gone off from Scipio's troops, roused him from his security, by letting him know the compass the Romans had taken to surprise him. The king terrified with the news, detached immediately ten thousand foreign soldiers, with two thousand Macedonians, under the command of Milo, and ordered them with all possible diligence to take possession of an eminence which the Romans had still to pass, before they arrived at Pythium. He accordingly got thither before them. A very rude engagement ensued upon this eminence, and the victory was for some time in suspense. But the king's detachment at length gave way on all sides, and were put to the rout. Scipio pursued them vigorously, and led his victorious troops into the plain.

When those who fled came to the camp of Perseus, they occasioned so great a terror in it, that he immediately decamped, and retired by his rear, seized with fear, and almost in despair. He held a great council, to deliberate upon proper measures. The question was, whether it was best to halt under the walls of Pydna, to try the chance of a battle, or to divide his troops into his towns, supply them well with provisions, and expect the enemy there, who could not subsist long in a country which he had taken care to lay waste, and could furnish neither forage for the horse, nor provisions for the men. The latter resolution had great inconveniences, and argued the prince reduced to the last extremity, without either hope or resource ; not to mention the hatred he had drawn upon himself by ruining the country, which he had not only commanded, but executed in person. Whilst Perseus, uncertain what to resolve, fluctuated in doubt ; the principal officers represented to him, that his army was much superior to that of the Romans ; that his troops were determined to behave well, having their wives and children to defend ; that being himself witness of all their actions, and fighting at their head, they would behave with double ardour, and give proofs of their valor in emulation of each other. These reasons reanimated the prince. He retired under the walls of Pydna, where he encamped, and prepared for a battle. He forgot nothing that might conduce to the advantage of his ground, assigned every one his post, and gave all orders with great presence of mind ; resolved to attack the Romans as soon as they appeared.

The place where he encamped was a bare level country, very fit for drawing up a great body of heavy armed foot in battle. Upon the right and left there were a ridge of little hills, which joining together, gave the light armed foot and the archers a secure retreat, and also a means to conceal their marching to surround the enemy, and to charge them in flank. The whole front of the army was covered by two small rivers, which had not much water at that time, in consequence of the season, for it was then about the end of summer, but whose steep banks would give the Romans great trouble, and break their ranks.

Paulus Emilius being arrived at Pythium, and having joined Scipio's detachment, marched down into the plain, and advanced in order of battle against the enemy ; keeping always on the sea coast, for the convenience of having provisions brought in barks from the Roman fleet. But when he came in view of the Macedonians, and had considered the good disposition of their army, and the number of their troops, he halted to deliberate on what he had to do. The young officers, full of ardour and impatience for the battle, advanced at the head of the troops, and came to him, to entreat him to give battle without any delay. Scipio, whose boldness was increased by his late success upon mount Olympus, distinguished himself above all the rest by his earnestness, and the pressing instances he made. He represented to him, that the generals, his predecessors, had suffered the enemy to escape out of their hands by delays ; that he was afraid Perseus would fly in the night, and they should be obliged to pursue him, with great danger and difficulty, to the remotest parts of his kingdom, in making the army take great compasses, through defiles and forests, as had happened in the preceding years. He advised him therefore, whilst the enemy was in the open field, to attack him immediately, and not to let slip so fair an occasion of conquering him.

“ Formerly,” replied the consul to young Scipio, “ I thought as you do now, and one day you will think as I do. I shall give you the reasons of my conduct another time ; at present satisfy yourself, and rely upon the discretion of an old general." The young officer was silent, well convinced that the consul had good reasons for acting as he did.

After he had spoken thus, he commanded the troops, who were at the head of the army, in view of the enemy, to draw up in battle, and to present a front, as if they intended to engage. They were disposed, according to the custom of the Romans, in three lines. At the same time the pioneers,^m covered by those lines, were employed in forming a camp. As they were a great number, the work was soon completed. The consul made the battalions file off gradually, beginning with the rear, which was nearest the workmen, and drew off the whole army into the intrenchments, without confusion, disorder, or being perceived by the enemy. The king, on his side, seeing the Romans declined fighting, retired also into his camp.

It was an inviolable lawⁿ amongst the Romans, though they were to stay only one day and night in a place, to inclose themselves in a well fortified camp ; by that means they placed themselves out of insult, and avoided all surprisē. The soldiers looked upon this military abode as their city ; the intrenchment served instead of walls, and the tents of houses. In case of a battle, if the army were overcome, the camp served for a retreat and refuge ; and, if victorious, they found it a place of quiet and security.

^m Hastati Principes Triarii.

ⁿ Majores vestri castra munita portum ad omnes casus exercitus ducebant esse. Patria altera est militaris hæc sedes, vallumque pro mœnibus et tentorium suum cuique militi domus ac penates sunt. Castra sunt victori receptaculum, victo per fugium. Liv. l. xliij. n. 39.

The night being come, and the troops having taken their refreshment, whilst they had no other thoughts than of going to rest, on a sudden the moon, which was then at full, and already very high, began to grow dark, and the light failing by little and little, it changed its colour several times, and was at length totally eclipsed. A tribune, called C. Sulpitius Gallus, one of the principal officers of the army, having assembled the soldiers, with the consul's permission, had apprized them of the eclipse, and showed them the exact moment when it would begin, and how long it would continue. The Roman soldiers, therefore, were not astonished at this accident; they only believed that Sulpitius had more than human knowledge. But the whole camp of the Macedonians were seized with horror and dread; and it was whispered throughout all the army, that this prodigy foretold the ruin of the king.

The next day Paulus Emilius, who was a very religious observer of all the ceremonies prescribed for the sacrifices, or rather very superstitious, applied himself to offering oxen to Hercules. He sacrificed twenty, one after another, without finding any favourable sign in the entrails of those victims. At length, at the one and twentieth, he imagined he saw such as promised him the victory, if he only defended himself, without attacking the enemy. At the same time he vowed a sacrifice to the same god, of one hundred oxen, with public games. Having made an end of all these religious ceremonies, about nine in the morning, he assembled his council. He had heard complaints of his slowness in attacking the enemy. He desired therefore to give this assembly an account of his conduct, especially out of regard for Scipio, to whom he had promised it. The reasons for his not having given battle the day before, were, first, because the enemy's army was much superior in number to his own, which he had been obliged to weaken considerably, by the great detachment for the guard of the baggage. In the second place, would it have consisted with prudence to engage troops entirely fresh with his, exhausted as they were by a long and painful march, by the excessive weight of their arms, by the heat of the sun, with which they had been almost broiled, and by thirst, which gave them insupportable pain? In the last place, he insisted strongly on the indispensable necessity a good general was under, not to fight till he had a well intrenched camp behind him, which might, in case of accident, serve the army for a retreat. He concluded his discourse with bidding them prepare for battle the same day.

° We see here, that there is a wide difference between the duty of soldiers and subaltern officers, and that of a general; the former have only to desire, and behave well in battle; but the general's business is to foresee, weigh, and compare every thing, in order to choose his measures with mature deliberation; and, by a wise delay of some days, or even hours, he often preserves an army, which an inconsiderate precipitation might have exposed to ruin.

Though the resolution for fighting had been taken on both sides, it was, however, rather a kind of chance that drew on the battle, than the order of the generals; who were not very warm on either side. Some Thracian soldiers charged a party of Romans in their return from foraging; seven hundred Ligurians ran to assist these foragers. The Macedonians caused troops to advance to support the Thracians; the reinforcements on both sides continually increasing, the battle at length became general.

• Divisa inter exercitum ducesque munia. Militibus cupidinem pugnandi convenire; duces providendo, consultando, cunctatione sapius quam temeritate prodesse. Tacit. Hist. l. iii. c. 20.

It is a misfortune that we have lost the passage of Polybius, and after him of Livy, which describes the order of this battle. This puts it out of my power to give a just idea of it, what Plutarch says, being quite different from the little which remains of it in Livy.

In the beginning of the charge, the Macedonian phalanx distinguished themselves from all the king's troops in a particular manner. Upon which Paulus Emilius advanced to the front ranks, and found, that the Macedonians, who formed the head of the phalanx, drove the points of their pikes into the shields of his soldiers in such a manner, that the latter, whatever efforts they made, were unable to reach them with their swords; and he saw, at the same time, that the whole front line of the enemy joined their bucklers, and presented their pikes. This rampart of brass and forest of pikes, impenetrable to his legions, filled him with astonishment and terror. He often spoke afterwards of the impression that dreadful sight made upon him, and what reason it gave him to doubt the success of the battle. But not to discourage his troops, he concealed from them his anxiety, and appearing with a gay and serene countenance, rode through all the ranks without helmet or cuirass, animating them with his expressions, and much more by his example. The general, more than sixty years of age, was seen exposing himself to danger and fatigue like a young officer.

The Pelignians, a people of Italy, who had attacked the Macedonian phalanx, not being able to break it with their utmost endeavours, one of their officers took the ensign of his company, and tossed it into the midst of the enemy. The rest threw themselves, in consequence, like desperate men upon that battalion. Astonishing actions ensued on both sides, with a most dreadful slaughter. The Pelignians endeavoured to cut the pikes of the Macedonians with their swords, and to push them back with their bucklers; striving sometimes to pull them out of their hands, or to turn them aside, in order to open themselves an entrance between them. But the Macedonians always keeping close order, and holding their pikes in both hands, presented that iron rampart, and gave those such great strokes that flung upon them, that, piercing shields and cuirasses, they laid the boldest of the Pelignians dead, who, without any caution continued to rush headlong, like wild beasts, upon the spears of their enemies, and to hurry upon a death they saw before their eyes.

The whole front line being thus put into disorder, the second was discouraged, and began to fall back. They did not fly indeed; but, instead of advancing, they retreated towards mount Olocris.^p When Paulus Emilius saw that, he tore his clothes, and was struck with extreme sorrow to see, upon the first troops having given way, that the Romans were afraid to face the phalanx. It presented a front covered with pikes, and close as an impenetrable intrenchment; and, continuing invincible, it could neither be broke nor opened. But at length the inequality of the ground, and the great extent of the front of battle, not admitting the enemy to continue every where that line of bucklers and pikes, Paulus Emilius observed the Macedonian phalanx was obliged to leave openings and intervals, and that it fell back on one side, whilst it advanced on the other; which must necessarily happen in great armies, when the troops, not always acting with the same vigor, fight also with different success.

^p That mountain was evidently part of Olympus.

Paulus Emilius, as an able general, who knew how to improve all advantages, dividing his troops into platoons, gave orders for them to fall into the void spaces of the enemy's battle, and to attack them no longer in front by a general charge, but by small detachments, and in different places at the same time. This order, given so critically, occasioned the gaining of the battle. The Romans immediately fell into the void spaces, and thereby put it out of the enemy's power to use their long pikes, charging them in flank and rear, where they were uncovered. The phalanx was broke in an instant, and all its force, which consisted solely in its union, and the weight of the whole body together, vanished and disappeared. When they came to fight man to man, or platoon to platoon, the Macedonians with their short swords, struck upon the Roman shields, which were strong and solid, and covered them almost from head to foot; on the contrary, they opposed small bucklers against the swords of the Romans, which were heavy and strong, and handled with such force and vigor, that they scarce discharged a blow which did not either cut deep, or make shields and armour fly in pieces, and draw blood. The phalanx having lost their advantage, and being taken on their weak side, resisted with great difficulty, and were at length overthrown.

The king of Macedonia, abandoning himself to his fear, rode off full speed in the beginning of the battle, and retired into the city of Pydna, under a pretence of going to offer a sacrifice to Hercules; as if, says Plutarch, Hercules was a god that would receive the sacrifices of abject cowards, or give ear to unjust vows; for it is not just that he should be victorious, who durst not face his enemy; whereas the same god received the prayer of Paulus Emilius, because he asked victory with sword in hand, and invoked his aid by fighting valiantly.

It was in the attack of the phalanx where the battle was warmest, and where the Romans found the greatest resistance. It was there also that the son of Cato, Paulus Emilius's son in law, after having done prodigies of valor, unhappily lost his sword, which slipped out of his hand. Upon this accident, quite out of himself and inconsolable, he ran through the ranks, and assembling a body of brave and resolute young soldiers, he rushed headlong and furious upon the Macedonians. After extraordinary efforts, and a most bloody slaughter, they made the latter give way, and remaining masters of the ground, they applied themselves in searching for the sword, which they found at last under heaps of arms and dead bodies. Transported with that good fortune, and raising shouts of victory, they fell with new ardour upon such of the enemy as stood firm ; so that at length the three thousand Macedonians who remained, and were a distinct body from the phalanx, were entirely cut in pieces ; not a man of them quitting his rank, or ceasing to fight, to the last moment of his life.

After the defeat of this body, all the rest fled ; and so great a number of them were killed, that the whole plain, to the foot of the mountain, was covered with the dead, and the next day, when the Romans passed the river Leucus, they found the waters still stained with their blood. It is said that twenty five thousand men on the side of the Macedonians perished in this battle. The Romans lost only one hundred, and made eleven or twelve thousand prisoners. The cavalry, which had no share in this battle, seeing the foot put to the rout, had retired ; and the Romans, from their violent ardour against the phalanx, did not think at that time of pursuing them.

This great battle was decided so suddenly, that the charge, which began at three in the afternoon, was followed by the victory before four. The rest of the day was employed in the pursuit, which was carried very far ; so that the troops did not return till late in the night. All the servants in the army went out to meet their masters with great shouts of joy, and conducted them with torches to the camp, where they had made illuminations, and covered the tents with wreaths of ivy,¹ and crowns of laurel.

¹ This was a custom among the Romans. Cesar writes in the third book of the civil war, " that he found in Pompey's camp the tents of Lentulus, and some others, covered with ivy." L. etiam Lentuli et nonnullorum tabernacula protecta hedera.

But in the midst of his great victory, the general was in extreme affliction. Of the two sons he had in the battle, the youngest, who was but seventeen years old, and whom he loved with most tenderness, because he had already given great hopes of himself, did not appear. The camp was in an universal alarm, and the cries of joy were changed into a mournful silence. They searched for him with torches among the dead, but to no purpose. At length, when the night was very much advanced, and they despaired of ever seeing him more, he returned from the pursuit, attended only by two or three of his comrades, all covered with the blood of the enemy. Paulus Emilius thought he had recovered him from the dead, and did not begin to taste the joy of his victory till that moment. He was reserved for other tears, and ruins no less to be deplored. The young Roman, of whom we speak, was the second Scipio, who was afterwards called Africanus, and Numantinus, from having destroyed Carthage and Numantia. He was adopted by the son of Scipio, the conqueror of Hannibal. The consul immediately despatched three couriers of distinction, of whom his son Fabius was one, to carry the news of this victory to Rome.

In the mean time, Perseus continuing his flight, had passed the city of Pydna, and endeavoured to gain Pella with all his horse, which had escaped from the battle without striking a blow. The foot soldiers that fled in disorder, meeting them upon the road, reproached them in the sharpest terms, calling them cowards and traitors; and carrying their resentment further, they pulled them off their horses, and wounded a great number of them. The king, who apprehended the consequences of that tumult, quitted the high road, and, that he might not be known, folded up his royal mantle, put it behind him, took the diadem from his head, and carried it in his hand ; and, to discourse with his friends with the more ease, he alighted and led his horse in his hand. Several of those who attended him took different routes from his, under various pretexts ; less to avoid the pursuit of the enemy, than to shun the fury of the prince, whose defeat had only served to irritate and inflame his natural ferocity. Of all his courtiers three only remained with him, and those all strangers. Evander of Crete, whom he had employed to assassinate king Eumenes, was one of them. He retained his fidelity for him to the last.

When he arrived, about midnight, in Pella, he stabbed two of his treasurers with his own hands, for being so bold as to represent to him the faults he had committed, and with ill timed freedom, to give him their counsel, upon what was necessary to be done for the retrieving his affairs. This cruel treatment of two of the principal officers of his court, who had failed only out of an imprudent and ill timed zeal, entirely lost him with every body. Alarmed by the almost universal desertion of his officers and courtiers, he did not think himself safe at Pella, and left it the same night to go to Amphipolis, carrying along with him the greatest part of his treasures. When he arrived there, he sent deputies to Paulus Emilius to implore his mercy. From Amphipolis he went into the island of Samothracia, and took refuge in the temple of Castor and Pollux. All the cities of Macedonia opened their gates to the victor, and made their submission.

The consul having quitted Pydna, arrived the next day at Pella, the happy situation of which he admired. The king's treasures had been kept in this city ; but only the three hundred talents he had sent to Gentius, king of Thrace, and afterwards caused to be brought back, were found there. Paulus Emilius, having been informed that Perseus was in Samothracia, repaired to Amphipolis, in order to pass from thence into that island.

† He was encamped at Sires,* in the country of the Odomantes, when he received a letter from Perseus, which was presented to him by three deputies, of inconsiderable birth and condition. He could not forbear shedding tears, when he reflected upon the uncertainty of human affairs, of which the present condition of Perseus was a sensible example. But when he saw this title and inscription upon the letter, " Perseus the king, to the consul Paulus Emilius, greeting ;" the stupid ignorance that prince seemed to be in of his condition, extinguished in him all sense of compassion ; and, though the tenor of the letter was couched in an humble and suppliant style, and little consisted with the royal dignity, he dismissed the deputies without an answer. How haughty were these proud republicans, to degrade an unfortunate king immediately in this manner ! Perseus perceived the name he was henceforth to forget. He wrote a second letter, to which he only put his name, without the addition of his quality. He demanded that commissioners should be sent to treat with him, which was granted. This negotiation had no effect, because, on the one side, Perseus would not renounce the royal dignity, and Paulus Emilius, on the other, insisted that he should submit his fate entirely to the determination of the Roman people.

† Liv. l. xlv. n. 3—9. Plut. in Paul. Emil. p. 269, 270.

* An obscure, unknown city, upon the eastern frontier of Macedonia.

During this time the pretor Octavius, who commanded the fleet, arrived at Samothracia. He did not take Perseus by force out of that asylum, in respect to the gods who presided in it, but he endeavoured by promises and threats to induce him to quit it, and surrender himself to the Romans. His endeavours were ineffectual.

A young Roman, named Acilius, either of himself, or in concert with the pretor, took another course to draw the king out of the sanctuary. In the assembly of the Samothracians, which was then held, he said to them ; " Is it a truth, or without foundation, that your island is held a sacred and inviolable asylum throughout all its extent ?" Upon being answered by all present, that it was undoubtedly so. " How, then," continued he, " do you suffer its sanctity to be violated by an homicide, contaminated with the blood of king Eumenes ? And as all religious ceremonies begin by the exclusion of those whose hands are impure, how can you suffer your temple to be profaned and defiled by the presence of an infamous murderer ?" This accusation fell upon Perseus ; but the Samothracians chose rather to apply it to Evander, whom all the world knew had been the agent in the intended assassination of Eumenes. They sent therefore to tell the king, that Evander was accused of assassination, and that he should appear, according to the custom of their sanctuary, to justify himself before the judges ; or, if he was afraid to do that, that he should take measures for his safety, and quit the temple. The king having sent for Evander, advised him in the strongest terms, not to submit to that sentence. He had his reasons for giving this counsel, apprehending he would declare, that the assassination had been undertaken by his order, and therefore gave him to understand, that the only method he could take was to kill himself. Evander seemed at first to consent to it, and professing that he had rather die by poison than the sword, he intended to make his escape by flight. The king was aware of that design, and fearing the Samothracians would let the weight of their resentment fall on him, as having withdrawn the offender from the punishment he deserved, he ordered him to be killed. This was polluting the sanctuary with a new crime ; but he corrupted the principal magistrate with presents of money, who declared in the assembly, that Evander had laid violent hands upon himself.

The pretor, not being able to persuade Perseus to quit his asylum, was reduced to deprive him of all means to embark and make his escape. However, notwithstanding his precautions, Perseus gained secretly a certain Cretan, called Oroandes, who had a merchant ship, and prevailed upon him to receive him on board, with all his treasures ; they amounted to two thousand talents, that is, about three hundred thousand pounds. But, suspicious as he was, he did not dispossess himself of the whole ; sent only a part of it to the ship, and reserved the rest of it to be carried on board with himself. The Cretan, following the genius of his country upon this occasion, shipped all the gold and silver that had been sent him in the evening, and let Perseus know, that he had only to come to the port at midnight with his children, and such of his people as were absolutely necessary to attend his person.

The appointed time approaching, Perseus with infinite difficulty, crept through a very narrow window, crossed a garden, and got out through a ruinous house, with his wife and son. The remainder of his treasures followed him. His grief and despair were inexpressible, when he was informed that Oroandes, with his rich freight, was under sail. He had intrusted his other children to Ion of Thessalonica, who had been his favourite, and betrayed him in his misfortunes; for he delivered up his children to Octavius; which was the principal cause that induced Perseus to put himself into the power of those who had his children in their hands.

He accordingly surrendered himself and Philip his son, to the pretor Octavius, who made him embark, in order to his being carried to the consul; having first apprized him of his coming. Paulus Emilius sent his son in law Tubero to meet him. Perseus, in a mourning habit, entered the camp, attended only by his son. The consul, who waited for him, with a sufficiently numerous train, upon his arrival, rose from his seat, and advancing some few steps, offered him his hand. Perseus threw himself at his feet; but he raised him immediately, and would not suffer him to embrace his knees. Having introduced him into his tent, he made him sit down, facing those who formed the assembly.

He began by asking him, "What cause of discontent had induced him to enter with so much animosity into a war with the Roman people, that exposed himself and his kingdom to the greatest dangers?" When, instead of the answer which every body expected, the king, fixing his eyes upon the ground, and shedding tears, kept silence; Paulus Emilius continued to this effect; "Had you ascended the throne a youth, I should be less surprised at your being ignorant of what it was to have the Roman people for your friends or enemies; but having been present in the war made by your father against us, and certainly remembering the peace, which we have punctually observed on our side, how could you prefer war rather than peace, with a people whose force in the former, and fidelity in the latter, you had so well experienced?" Perseus making no more answer to this reproach than he had done to the first question; "In whatsoever manner, notwithstanding," resumed the consul, "these affairs have happened; whether they are the effects of error, to which all mankind are liable, or of chance; or that fatal destiny which superintends all things, take courage. The clemency with which the Roman people have behaved in regard to many other kings and nations, ought to inspire you, I do not say with some hope only, but with almost entire confidence, that you will meet with the same treatment." He spoke this in Greek to Perseus; then, turning towards the Romans, "You see," said he in his own language, "a great example of the inconstancy of human affairs. It is to you principally, young Romans, I address this discourse. The uncertainty of what may happen to us every day, ought to teach us never to use any one with insolence and cruelty in our prosperity, nor rely too much upon our present advantages. The proof of real merit and true valor is neither to be too elate in good, nor too dejected in bad fortune." Paulus Emilius, having dismissed the assembly, charged Tubero with the care of the king. He invited him that day to his table, and ordered him to be treated with all the honours his present condition would admit.

Exemplum insigne cernitis, inquit mutationis rerum humanarum. Vobis hoc præcipue dico, juvenes. Ideo in secundis rebus nihil in quemquam superbe ac violenter consulere decet, nec præsentem credere fortunæ, cum quid vesper ferat, incertum sit. Is demum vir erit, cujus animum nec prospera flatu suo efferet, nec adversa infringet.
Liv.

The army went afterwards into winter quarters. Amphipolis received the greatest part of the troops; the rest were distributed into the neighbouring cities. Thus ended the war between the Romans and Perseus, which had continued four years; and with it a kingdom so illustrious both in Europe and Asia. "Perseus had reigned eleven years. ^v He was reckoned the fortieth king from Caranus, who was the first that reigned in Macedonia. So important a conquest cost Paulus Emilius only fifteen days.

The kingdom of Macedonia had been very obscure till the time of Philip, son of Amyntas. Under that prince, and by his great exploits, it made considerable acquisitions, which did not extend, however, beyond the bounds of Europe; he annexed to it a part of Thrace and Illyria, and acquired a kind of empire over all Greece. It afterwards extended into Asia ; and in the thirteen years of the reign of Alexander, subjected all the provinces of which the vast empire of the Persians was composed, and carried its victorious arms to the extremities of the earth ; I mean, to Arabia on one side, and the Indies on the other. This empire of Macedonia, the greatest that had been in the world, divided, or rather torn, into different kingdoms, after the death of Alexander, by his successors, who took each a part to himself, subsisted during something more than one hundred and fifty years, from the exalted height to which the victorious arms of that prince had raised it, to the entire ruin of Macedonia. Such was the period of the so much boasted exploits of that famous conqueror, the terror and admiration of the universe ; or, to speak more justly, the example of the most vain and most frantic ambition the world ever knew.

^u Liv. l. xiv. n. 4.

^v Livy, such as we have him, says the twentieth. Justin the thirtieth. It is thought there is an error in the figure, and that it should be corrected, the fortieth, with Eusebius.

The three deputies whom Paulus Emilius had sent to Rome, to carry thither the news of his victory over Perseus, used all possible diligence on their journey. But long before their arrival, and only the fourth day after the battle, whilst the games were celebrating in the circus, it was whispered about, that a battle had been fought in Macedonia, and Perseus entirely defeated. This news was attended with clapping of hands, and cries of victory throughout the whole circus. But when the magistrates, after a strict inquiry, had discovered that it was a rumour, without either author or foundation, that false and short lived joy ceased, and left only a secret hope, that it was perhaps the presage of a victory, which either was already or would soon be obtained.

The arrival of the deputies put Rome out of pain. They were informed, that Perseus had been entirely defeated; that he was flying, and could not escape falling into the hands of the victor. The people's joy, which had been suspended till then, broke out immoderately. The deputies read a circumstantial narrative of the battle, first in the senate, and afterwards in the assembly of the people. Public prayers and sacrifices were decreed, and all the temples filled in an instant with infinite crowds of people, who went thither to return thanks to the gods for their signal protection vouchsafed the republic.

^w After the nomination of new consuls at Rome, the command of the army in Macedonia was continued to Paulus Emilius, and that in Illyria to L. Anicius. Ten commissioners were then appointed to regulate affairs in Macedonia, and five for Illyria. The senate, before they set out, regulated their commission in part. It was decreed in particular, that the Macedonians and Illyrians should be declared free; in order that all nations might know, the end of the Roman arms was not to subject free people, but to deliver such as were enslaved; so that the one, under the protection of the Roman name, might always retain their liberty, and the other, who were under the rule of kings, might be treated with more lenity and justice by them, in consideration for the Romans; or that, whenever war should arise between those kings and the Roman people, the nations might know, that the issue of those wars would be victory for the Romans, and liberty for them. The senate also abolished certain duties upon the mines and land estates ; because those duties could not be collected but by the ministry of tax farmers, commonly called publicans ; and that whenever such sort ^x of farmers are suffered, the laws are of no force, and the people are always oppressed. They established a general council for the nation, lest the populace should cause the liberty granted them by the senate to degenerate into a destructive license. Macedonia was divided into four regions ; each of which had a distinct council, and were to pay the Romans one moiety of the tributes which they had been accustomed to pay their kings. These were in part the orders with which the commissioners for Macedonia were charged. Those for Illyria had almost the same instructions, and arrived there first. After having communicated their commission to the propretor Anicius, who came to Scodra to meet them, they summoned an assembly of the principal persons of the nation. Anicius having ascended his tribunal, declared to them, that the senate and people of Rome granted liberty to the Illyrians, and that the garrisons should be withdrawn from all the cities and forts of the country as soon as possible. In regard to some people, who either before or during the war, had declared for the Romans, an exemption from all taxes was added to their liberty ; all the rest were discharged from one half of the impost formerly paid to the kings. Illyria was divided into three regions or parts, which had each of them their public council and magistrates.

Before the deputies from Macedonia ^y arrived there, Paulus Emilius, who was at leisure, visited, during the autumn, the most celebrated cities of Greece ; to see those things with his own eyes, which all the world talked of without knowing them. Having left the command of the camp to Sulpicius Gallus, he set out with a small train, accompanied by young Scipio his son, and Atheneus, king Eumenes's brother.

^x Et ubi publicanus est, ibi aut jus publicum vanum, aut libertatem sociis nullam esse. Liv.

^y Liv. l. xlv. n. 27, 28. Plut. in Paul. Æmil. p. 270.

He passed through Thessaly, in his way to Delphos, the most celebrated oracle in the universe. The multitude and value of the presents, statues, vessels, and tripods, with which that temple was filled, surprised him extremely. He there offered a sacrifice to Apollo. Having seen a great square pillar of white marble, on which a golden statue of Perseus was to have been placed, he caused his own to be set upon it, saying, "That the vanquished ought to give place to the victors."

He saw at Lebadia the temple of Jupiter, surnamed Trophonius, and the entrance of the cavern into which those who consulted the oracle² descended. He offered a sacrifice to Jupiter, and the goddess Hercynna, who was believed to be the daughter of Trophonius.

At Chalcis he gratified his curiosity in seeing the Euripus, and the ebb and flow of the sea, which is there very frequent and extraordinary.

From thence he went to the city of Aulis, from which port the famous fleet of Agamemnon sailed for Troy. He made a visit to the temple of Diana in that place, upon whose altar that king of kings sacrificed his daughter Iphigenia, to obtain a prosperous voyage from the goddess.

² For an account of this oracle, see book x. chap. iii. sect. 2.

After having passed through Oropus in Attica, where the soothsayer Amphiloehus was honoured as a god, he came to Athens, a city celebrated by ancient renown, where abundance of objects presented themselves to his view, well capable of inspiring and gratifying his curiosity ; the citadel, the ports, the walls which joined the Pireus to the city, the arsenals for the navy, erected by illustrious generals, the statues of gods and men, in which it was hard to know, whether the matter or art were most admirable. He did not forget to offer a sacrifice to Minerva, the tutelary goddess of the citadel.

Whilst Paulus Emilius was in that city, he demanded an excellent philosopher of the Athenians to finish the education of his children, and a fine painter to design the ornaments of his triumph. They immediately cast their eyes upon Metrodorus, who excelled both in philosophy and painting ; a very singular and extraordinary praise, which was confirmed by experience, and the approbation of Paulus Emilius. We here see the attention paid by the great men of antiquity to the education of their children. The sons of that Roman general were then of some age, the youngest of the two, who made the campaign in Macedonia with his father, being at that time seventeen years old. He thought it necessary, however, to have a philosopher with them, capable of forming both their minds by the study of the sciences, and their manners by that of moral virtue, which of all studies is the most important, and yet the most neglected. To know what are the effects of such an education, we have only to consider the future greatness of the youngest of the two sons of this consul, who inherited the name and merit of Scipio

Africanus, his grandfather by adoption, and of Paulus Emilius, his natural father ; who ruined Carthage and Numantia ; who distinguished himself as much by polite learning and the sciences, as by his military virtues ; who held it for his honour to have Polybius the historian, Panetius the philosopher, and Terence the poet, for his friends and companions ; who, in a word, to use the terms of a ^a writer of excellent sense, never said, did, nor thought, any thing unworthy a Roman. Paulus Emilius, having found the precious treasure he sought, in the person of Metrodorus, left Athens well satisfied.

He arrived in two days at Corinth. The citadel and isthmus were an agreeable sight to him. The first, which was situated upon the top of a mountain, abounded with streams and fountains of exceedingly pure water ; and the isthmus, which separated by a very small neck of land two neighbouring seas, the one on the east, and the other on the west of it.

Sicyon and Argos, two very illustrious cities, were the next in his way ; and afterwards Epidaurus, less opulent than the two others, but well known from the famous temple of Esculapius, where he saw an infinite multitude of rich presents, the offerings of sick persons, out of gratitude for the cures they imagined to have received from that god.

Sparta was not distinguished by the magnificence of its buildings, but by the wisdom of its laws, customs, and discipline.

^a P. Scipio Æmilianus, vir avitis P. Africani paternisque L. Pauli virtutibus simillimus, omnibus belli ac togæ dotibus, ingeniique ac studiorum eminentissimus seculi sui, qui nihil in vita nisi laudandum aut fecit, aut dixit, ac sensit. Paterc. l. i. c. 12.

Having taken Megalopolis in his way, he arrived at Olympia, where he saw abundance of things worthy of admiration; but, when he cast his eyes upon the statue of Jupiter, Phidias's masterpiece, he was as much struck, says Livy, as if he had seen the god himself, and cried out, that "this Jupiter of Phidias was the exact Jupiter of Homer."^b Imagining himself in the capitol, he offered a more solemn sacrifice here than he had done any where else.

Having made the tour of Greece in this manner, without giving himself any trouble to know people's thoughts in regard to Perseus, and to avoid giving the allies any cause of discontent, he returned to Demetrias. He had met on his way a number of Etolians, who came to inform him of an unhappy accident which had befallen their city. He ordered them to attend him at Amphipolis. Having received advice, that the ten commissioners had already passed the sea, he quitted all other affairs, and went to meet them at Apollonia, which was one day's journey from Amphipolis. He was very much surprised to meet Perseus there, whom his guards suffered to go about with abundance of liberty, for which he afterwards warmly reprov'd Sulpicius, to whose care he had confided that important prisoner. He put him, with Philip his son, into the hands of Posthumius, with orders to guard him better. For his daughter and younger son, he caused them to be brought from Samothracia to Amphipolis, where he ordered such care to be taken of them as their birth and condition required.

^b To have so well expressed the idea of Homer, is highly to the praise of Phidias; but the having so well conceived all the majesty of God, is much more to that of Homer.

° The commissioners being come thither, as had been agreed on with them, and having entered the chamber of the assembly, where a great number of Macedonians were present, he took his seat in his tribunal, and after having caused silence to be made by the crier, Paulus Emilius repeated in Latin the regulations made by the senate and by himself, in conjunction with the commissioners, relating to Macedonia. The principal articles were, that Macedonia was declared free; that it should pay the Romans only half the tribute paid the king, which was fixed at the sum of one hundred talents, or one hundred thousand crowns; that it should have a public council, composed of a certain number of senators, wherein all affairs should be discussed and adjudged; that it should be divided for the future into four regions, or cantons, that each should have their council, in which particular affairs should be examined; and that no person should contract marriage, or purchase lands or houses, out of their own canton. Several other articles of less importance were annexed to these. The pretor Octavius, who was present in this assembly, explained the several articles in Greek, as Paulus Emilius pronounced them in Latin. The article of liberty, and that for the diminution of tribute, gave the Macedonians exceeding pleasure, who little expected them; but they looked upon the division of Macedonia into different regions, that were not to have their usual commerce with each other, like the rending a body in pieces, by separating its members which have no life, and subsist only in their mutual support of each other.

° Liv. L. xlv. n. 29, 30,

^d The consul afterwards gave audience to the Eto-lians. I shall relate elsewhere the subject of it.

After those foreign affairs were over, ^e Paulus Emilius recalled the Macedonians into the assembly, in order to put the last hand to his regulations. He spoke at first upon the senators, who were to compose the public council, wherein the national affairs were to be transacted, and the choice of them was left to the people. A list was then read of the principal persons of the country, who were to be sent into Italy, with such of their children as had attained the age of fifteen.
This article seemed very hard at first ; but it was soon perceived, that it had been resolved only for the better security of the people's liberty ; for this list included the great lords, generals of the army, commanders of the fleet, all such as had any offices at the court, or had been employed in embassies, with many other officers accustomed to pay their court to the king in the abject manner of slaves, and to command others with insolence. These were all rich persons, who lived at a great expense, had magnificent equipages, and would not easily be reduced to a quite different kind of life, in which liberty makes the whole people equal, and subjects all to the laws. They were therefore all ordered to quit Macedonia, and transport themselves into Italy, upon pain of death for such as disobeyed. The regulations made for Macedonia by Paulus Emilius were so reasonable, that they did not seem calculated for conquered enemies, but for faithful allies, with whom there was entire reason to be satisfied ; and the effects, from which the nature of laws are best known, proved.

^d Liv. l. xlv. n. 31.

^e Ibid. n. 32.

that there was nothing to be amended in the institutions of that wise magistrate.

^fTo these serious affairs succeeded a celebration of games, for which preparations had long been making, and to which care had been taken to invite all the most considerable persons in the cities of Asia and Greece. The Roman general offered magnificent sacrifices to the gods, and gave superb feasts ; the king's treasures supplying him abundantly with the means of defraying such great expenses ; but for the good order and fine taste observable in them, he was indebted solely to himself. For having so many thousands to receive, he evidenced so nice a discernment, and so exact a knowledge of the quality of all the guests, that every one was lodged, placed, and treated according to his rank and merit ; and there was nobody who had not reason to praise his politeness and generosity. The Greeks could not sufficiently admire, that even in games till then unknown to the Romans, he should instance so distinguishing a judgment and attention ; and that a man employed in the greatest, should not neglect the least propriety in small affairs.

He had caused all the spoils that he did not think fit to carry to Rome, to be piled up in one great heap ; bows, quivers, arrows, javelins, in a word, arms of all sorts ; and caused them to be disposed of in form of trophies. With a torch in his hand he set fire to them first himself, as his principal officers did after him.

He afterwards exposed to the view of the spectators, upon a place raised expressly for the occasion, all that was richest and most magnificent in the spoils he had taken in Macedonia, and which were to be carried to Rome ; rich moveables, statues, and paintings of the greatest masters, vessels of gold, silver, copper, and ivory. Never had Alexandria, in the times of its greatest opulence, beheld any thing like what was now exhibited.

^f Plut. in Paul. Emil. p. 270. Liv. l. xiv. n. 32.

But the highest satisfaction Paulus Emilius received from his magnificence, and which was still more grateful to self love, was to see, that in the midst of so many extraordinary objects and curious sights, nothing was thought so wonderful, or so worthy of attention and admiration as himself. And as people were surprised at the fine order of his table, he said, with an air of pleasantry, that the same genius which was necessary in disposing a battle would serve also in regulating a feast ; in the first, it rendered an army formidable to enemies ; in the latter, an entertainment agreeable to guests.

His disinterestedness and magnanimity were no less praised than his magnificence and politeness, for he never so much as saw the gold and silver found amongst the king's treasures, which amounted to very great sums, but ordered it all to be delivered to treasurers in order to its being applied to the use of the public. He only permitted his sons, who were fond of study, to keep the books of Perseus's library for their own use. The young noblemen of those times, and such as were designed one day for the command of armies, did not profess a contempt for learning, nor believe it either unworthy of their birth, or unnecessary to the profession of arms.

§ When Paulus Emilius had regulated all the affairs of Macedonia, he took leave of the Greeks ; and after having exhorted the Macedonians not to abuse the liberty granted them by the Romans, and to preserve it by good government and union, he set out for Epirus, with a decree of the senate, to abandon all the cities that had revolted to the king's party, to be plundered by his troops. He had sent also Scipio Nasica, and Fabius his son, with part of the army, to ravage the country of the Illyrians, who had given aid to that prince.

The Roman general, being arrived in Epirus, thought it proper, for the more prudent execution of his commission, that his design should not be foreseen. He therefore sent officers into all the cities, under pretence of withdrawing the garrisons, in order that the Epirots should enjoy the same liberty as the Macedonians. So unworthy a stratagem was called prudence. He then signified to ten of the principal persons of each city, that they should bring all the gold and silver in their houses and temples, upon a certain day, into the market place, to be laid up in the public treasury, and distributed his troops into all the cities. Upon the day prefixed, all the gold and silver was brought early in the morning into the public place, and at ten of the clock, the soldiers fell furiously upon the houses which were abandoned to them to be plundered at their mercy. One hundred and fifty thousand men were made slaves, and after the cities were pillaged, their walls were demolished, the number of which wanted very little of seventy. The whole booty was sold, and of the sum raised by it, each of the horse had about ten pounds sterling, four hundred denarii, and each of the foot about five pounds, two hundred denarii.

§ Liv. l. xlv. n. 33, 34.

After Paulus Emilius, contrary to his natural disposition, which was gentle and humane, had caused this decree to be put in execution, he advanced to the sea at the city of Oricum. Some days after, Anicius having assembled the remainder of the Epirots and Acarnanians, ordered the principal persons of them whose cause had been reserved for the judgment of the senate, to follow him into Italy.

^h Paulus Emilius, being arrived at the mouth of the Tiber, entered that river in king Perseus's galley, which had sixteen benches of oars, and wherein were displayed, not only the arms which had been taken, but all the rich stuffs and finest carpets of purple found amongst the booty. All the Romans, who came out to meet that galley, accompanied it in crowds upon the side of the river, and seemed to give the proconsul an anticipation of the honours of the triumph he had so well deserved. But the soldiery, who had looked with a greedy eye upon the immense treasures of the king, and had not had all the share of them they had promised themselves, retained a warm resentment upon that account, and were very ill satisfied with Paulus Emilius. They openly reproached him with having treated them with too much rigor and authority, and seemed determined to refuse him the honour of a triumph by their suffrages. The soldiers called that general's exactitude, in point of discipline, rigor : and their discontent, occasioned by their avarice, threw a false gloss upon the excellent qualities of Paulus Emilius ; to whom, however, they were obliged to do justice in their hearts, by acknowledging the superiority of his merit in every thing.

^h liv. l. xlv. n. 35—40. Plut. in Paul. Emil. p. 271.

After some debates, a triumph was granted him. Never had any thing been so magnificent. It continued three days successively. I do not enter in this place into a particular account of it ; that seems foreign to the Grecian history. The money in specie carried in it, without reckoning an infinite number of gold and silver vessels, amounted to more than one million two hundred and fifty thousand pounds sterling. One single cup of massy gold, which Paulus Emilius had caused to be made, and weighed ten talents,¹ was valued for the gold only, at one hundred thousand crowns. It was adorned with jewels, and consecrated to Jupiter Capitolinus.

Behind these rich spoils and treasures, which were carried in pomp, was seen the chariot of Perseus, with his arms, and upon his arms, his royal diadem. At some distance followed his children, with their governors, preceptors, and all the officers of their household, who, shedding tears, held out their hands to the people, and taught those little captives to do the same, and to endeavour by their supplications and prayers, to move them in their favour. They were two sons and a daughter, who had little sense of the greatness of their calamity, from the tenderness of their years ; a circumstance which still more excited compassion. All eyes were fixed upon them, whilst their father was scarce regarded, and in the midst of the public joy, the people could not refrain from tears at so mournful a sight.

¹ A talent weighed sixty pounds.

King Perseus walked after his children and all their train, wrapt in a mourning cloak. His air and behaviour seemed to argue, that the excess of his misfortunes had turned his brain. He was followed by a troop of his friends and courtiers, who, hanging down their heads and weeping, with their eyes always fixed upon him, sufficiently explained to the spectators, that, little affected with their own misfortunes, they were sensible solely to those of their king.

It is said, that Perseus sent to desire Paulus Emilius not to exhibit him as a spectacle to the Romans, and to spare him the indignity of being led in triumph. Paulus Emilius replied coldly, "The favour he asks of me is in his own power; he can procure it for himself." He reproached, in those few words, his cowardice and excessive love of life, which the Pagans thought incumbent on them to sacrifice generously in such conjunctures. They did not know, that it is never lawful to attempt upon one's own life. But Perseus was not prevented by that consideration.

Paulus Emilius, seated in a superb chariot, and magnificently adorned, closed the march. He had his two sons on each side of him.

Whatever compassion he had for the misfortunes of Perseus, and however inclined he might be to serve him, all he could do for him, was to have him removed from the public prison to a more commodious place. Himself and his son Alexander were carried, by order of the senate, to Alba, where he was guarded and supplied with money, furniture, and people to serve him. Most authors agree, that he occasioned his own death by abstaining from food. He had reigned eleven years. Macedonia was not reduced into a province till some years afterwards.

Cn. Octavius and L. Anicius were also granted the honour of a triumph ; the first for his naval victories ; and the other for that he had gained in Illyria.

Cotys, king of Thrace, sent to demand his son, who had been confined in prison, after having been led in triumph. He excused himself for his attachment to the party of Perseus, and offered a great ransom for the prisoner. The senate, without receiving his excuses, replied, that having more regard to his ancient services than late fault, they would send back his son, but without accepting any ransom ; that the favours conferred by the Roman people were free and voluntary, and that they chose rather to leave the price of them to the gratitude and affection of those they obliged, than to be paid immediately for them.

ARTICLE II.

THIS article includes the space of something more than twenty years, from the defeat of Perseus, to the taking and destruction of Corinth by Mummius, at which time Greece was reduced into a Roman province.

SECTION I.

ATTALUS COMES TO ROME TO CONGRATULATE THE ROMANS UPON THEIR SUCCESS IN MACEDONIA.

* AMONGST the different embassies from kings and states, which came to Rome after the victory over Perseus, Attalus, Eumenes's brother, drew upon him,¹ more than all others, the eyes and attention of the Romans. The ravages committed by the Asiatic Gauls in the kingdom of Pergamus, had laid Attalus under the necessity of going to Rome, to implore the republic's aid against those barbarians. Another still more specious reason had obliged him to make that voyage. It was necessary to congratulate the Romans upon their last victory, and to receive the applauses he deserved for the part he had taken in the war against Perseus, and for having shared with them in all the dangers of it. He was received at Rome with all the marks of honour and amity that a prince could expect, who had proved, in the army in Macedonia, a constant and determinate attachment for the Romans. He had a most honourable reception, and made his entrance into the city attended by a very numerous train.

All these honours, the real cause of which he did not penetrate, made him conceive thoughts and hopes which perhaps had never entered into his mind, if not suggested to him. The greatest part of the Romans had no longer any esteem or affection for Eumenes. His secret negotiations with Perseus, of which they had been apprized, made them believe that prince had never been heartily on their side, and that he only waited an occasion to declare against them. Full of this prejudice, some of the most distinguished Romans, in their private conversations with Attalus, advised him not to mention the business his brother had sent him to treat of, but to speak solely of what related to himself. They gave him to understand, that the senate to whom Eumenes was become suspected, and even odious, from his having appeared to waver between Perseus and the Romans, had thoughts of depriving him of part of his kingdom, and to give it to himself, upon whom they could rely as an assured friend incapable of changing. We may perceive here the maxims of the Roman policy ; and these detached lines may serve to unveil it upon other occasions, when more attentive to conceal it.

* A. M. 3837. Ant. J. C. 167.

¹ Polyb. Leg. xciii. Liv. l. xlv. n. 19, 20.

The temptation was delicate to a prince, who, without doubt, did not want ambition, and who was not of a character to reject such pleasing hopes, when they presented themselves to him without being solicited. He listened therefore to these discourses and this proposal, and the rather, because they came from some of the principal persons of Rome, whose wisdom he esteemed, and whose probity he respected. The affair went so far, that he promised them to demand in the senate that part of his brother's kingdom should be given to him.

Attalus had a physician in his train, called Stratius, whom Eumenes, suspecting his brother, had sent with him to Rome, to have an eye upon his conduct, and to recal him to his duty, by good counsel, if he should happen to depart from it. Stratius had wit and penetration, and his manners were very insinuating, and well adapted to persuasion. Having either discovered, or learned from Attalus himself, the design that had been instilled into him, he took the advantage of some favourable moments to open himself to him. He represented, that the kingdom of Pergamus, weak of itself, and but very lately established, had subsisted, and been improved solely by the union and good understanding of the brothers who possessed it ; that only one of them, indeed, enjoyed the name of king, and wore the diadem ; but, that they all reigned in effect ; that Eumenes, having no male issue, for the son he had afterwards, and who succeeded him, was not then in being, he could leave his throne only to his next brother ; that his right to the succession of the kingdom was therefore incontestable ; and that, considering the age and infirmities of Eumenes, the time for such succession could not be very remote. And wherefore, then, should he anticipate and hasten, by a violent and criminal undertaking, what would soon happen in a just and natural manner ? Did he desire to divide the kingdom with his brother, or to deprive him of it entirely ? If he had only a part of it, both of them, weakened by such division, and exposed to the enterprises of their neighbours, might be equally undone in the consequence. That if he proposed to reign alone, what would become of his elder brother ? Would he reduce him to live as a private person, or send him, at his years, into banishment ? Or, in a word, would he cause him to be put to death ? That he did not doubt but such thoughts must give him horror. That not to speak of the fabulous accounts of the tragical effects of fraternal discord, the recent example of Perseus might remind him of them. That that unfortunate prince, who had torn the sceptre from his brother, by shedding his blood, pursued by the divine vengeance, had lately laid down the same sceptre, at the feet of a victor, in the temple of Samothracia, and in a manner before the eyes, and by the order of the gods who preside there, the witnesses and avengers of his guilt. That he was assured the very persons, who less out of friendship for him than ill will for Eumenes, gave him at present such pernicious counsels, would be the first to praise his tender and constant affection for his brother, if he continued faithfully attached to him to the last. Stratius added the extreme danger to which Attalus would expose the kingdom of Pergamus, in the present conjuncture, when the Gauls were preparing to invade it.

How unworthy was it of the Romans to kindle and blow up the fire of discord in this manner between brothers! Of what value must a sincere, prudent, and disinterested friend appear at such a time! What an advantage is it for a prince to give those who approach him the liberty of speaking freely and without reserve to him, and of being known by them in that light! The wise remonstrances of Stratius had their effect with Attalus. That prince, having been introduced into the senate, without speaking against his brother, or demanding a division of the kingdom of Pergamus, contented himself with congratulating the senate, in the name of Eumenes and his brothers, upon the victory gained in Macedonia. He modestly displayed the zeal and affection with which he had served in the war against Perseus. He desired that they would send ambassadors to check the insolence of the Gauls, and to reduce them to their former state ; and concluded, with requesting that the investiture of Enus and Maronea, cities of Thrace, might be given to him, which places had been conquered by Philip, father of Perseus, and the possession disputed with him by Eumenes.

The senate, imagining that Attalus would demand another audience, in order to speak in particular of his pretensions upon part of his brother's dominions, promised before hand to send ambassadors according to his demand, and made the prince the usual presents. They promised besides, to put him into possession of the two cities, as he desired. But when it was known that he had left Rome, the senate, offended to find that he had done nothing they expected from him, and not being able to be revenged upon him in any other manner, revoked the promise they had made him, and, before the prince was out of Italy, declared Enus and Maronea free and independent cities. They sent, however, an embassy to the Gauls, at the head of which was P. Licinius, but with very different instructions to those demanded by Attalus. The Roman policy took off the mask entirely at this time, and showed an aspect very unlike the frankness and probity of their ancestors.

^m The senate, some days after, gave audience to the Rhodians, which made a great noise. They were at first refused to be heard, as having rendered themselves unworthy of that honour by their conduct ; and even a declaration of war against them was talked of. Rhodes, alarmed at it, sent two new deputies. Having obtained admittance to the senate, with great difficulty, they appeared there as suppliants, dressed in mourning habits, and with their faces bathed in their tears. Astymedes spoke, and with a voice interrupted with sighs, took upon him the defence of his unfortunate country. He took great care not to show at first his desire to justify it. He knew that it had justly incurred the anger of the Roman people; he confessed its faults; he called to mind the indiscreet embassy, which the insolent pride of the orator who spoke, had rendered still more criminal; but he begged the senate to make some difference between the entire body of the nation, and a few private persons disavowed by them, and whom they were ready to deliver up. He represented, that there was no republic nor city that did not include some bad members; that, after all, there were no other crimes objected to them but words; foolish indeed, rash, extravagant, which he confessed to be the characteristics, and failings of his nation, but such as wise persons seldom lay much stress upon, or punish with exceeding rigor, no more than Jupiter aims his thunders at all that speak with little respect of his divinity. "But," said he, "the neutrality observed by us in the late war, is looked upon as a certain proof of our enmity, in regard to you." Is there a tribunal in the world, wherein the intention, when without effect, is punished as the action itself? But let your severity be carried to that excess, at most the punishment can only fall on those who have had this intention, and then the majority of us are innocent. Admitting even that this neutrality and inaction make us all criminal; ought the real services we have rendered you in the two preceding wars, to be deemed as nothing, and will they not cover the omission imputed to us in the last? Let Philip, Antiochus, and Perseus, bear witness now in our cause. The voices of the two first will certainly be for us, and absolve us; and, for the third, at most, and in the severest sense, the sentence must appear doubtful and uncertain. Can you then, according to this state of the question, pass a fatal decree against Rhodes; for you are now upon the point of deciding, whether it shall subsist any longer, or be entirely destroyed; you may declare war against us; but not a single Rhodian will take up arms against you. If you persist in your resentment, we demand time to go and report our deputation at Rhodes, and at that moment our whole city, men, women, and free persons, will embark with all our estates and effects; we will abandon our household gods, as well public as private, and come to Rome, where, after we have thrown our gold and silver, and all we have, at your feet, we will deliver up ourselves, our wives, and our children to your discretion. We will suffer here before your eyes, whatever you shall think fit to inflict upon us. If Rhodes is condemned to be plundered and set on fire, at least we shall spare ourselves the sight of that calamity. You may by your resolves declare yourselves our enemies; but there is a secret sense in the bottom of our hearts, that declares quite the contrary, and assures us, that whatever hostilities you may act against us, you will never find us otherwise than friends and servants.”

^m Polyb. Leg. xciii.—xcix. c. et civ. Liv. l. xlv. n. 20—25.

^a Neque moribus neque legibus ullius, civitatis ita comparatum esse, ut si quis vellet inimicum perire, si nihil fecerit quo id fiat, capitis damnatur. Liv.

After this discourse, the deputies prostrated themselves upon the earth, and held out their hands towards the senators with olive branches in them, to demand peace. When they were withdrawn by order of the senate, they proceeded to vote upon the affair. All who had served in Macedonia in quality of consuls, pretors, or lieutenants, and who had most experienced their foolish pride and enmity to the Romans, were very much against them. M. Portius Cato, the celebrated censor, known by the severity of his character, which often rose to hardness of heart, was softened at this time in favour of the Rhodians, and spoke for them with great warmth and eloquence. Livy does not repeat his discourse, because it was then extant in a work of Cato's own, entitled, De Originibus, wherein he had inserted his own orations.

The world has reason to regret the loss of so valuable a collection. Aulus Gellius^o has preserved some fragments of this discourse of Cato's; by which it appears, he made use of almost the same reasons with the ambassadors of Rhodes. I shall cite some passages of it at the bottom of the page, to assist the reader in knowing and distinguishing the manly and energetic style which characterized the Roman eloquence in those ancient times, when more attention was had to the force of thoughts, than to the elegance of words.

^o Liv. l. vii. c. 5.

P Cato begins his discourse by representing to the Romans, that they ought not to abandon themselves to the extravagance of excessive joy ; that prosperity generally excites pride and insolence ; that he apprehends, in the present case, they may form resolutions which may draw some misfortune upon Rome, and cause the frivolous joy, to which they gave themselves up, to vanish like a dream. “ Adversity,” says he, “ in humbling the spirit, restores us to our reason, and teaches us what is necessary to be done. Prosperity, on the contrary, hurries us in a manner out of our way, by the joy it occasions, and makes us lose sight of the measures which a calm situation of mind would enable us to discern and execute. It is therefore, fathers, I am absolutely of opinion, that we should defer the decision of this affair, till, having recovered from the violent emotions of our joy, we may be masters of ourselves, and capable of deliberating with more maturity.” He adds, “ That he indeed believes the Rhodians were far from desiring that the Romans should have conquered Perseus ; but that they had such sentiments, in common with all other states ; sentiments, which did not proceed from their enmity to the Romans, but from the love of their own liberty ; for which they had just cause to fear, when there should be none in a condition to dispute empire with us, and we should become absolute masters of all nations. For the rest, the Rhodians did not aid Perseus. Their whole crime,⁹ by the consent of their most violent accusers, is to have intended to declare war against us. But how long has the will, the intention only, been a crime? Is there any one amongst us that would be willing to subject himself to this rule? For my part, I am sure I would not. The Rhodians,^r it is said, are proud. I should be very sorry that my children could justly make me that reproach. But, pray, in what does their pride affect us? Would it become us to make it a crime in them to be prouder than we are?"

P Scio solere plerisque hominibus rebus secundis atque prolixis atque prosperis animum excellere, superbiam atque ferociam augescere atque crescere ; quod mihi nunc magnæ curæ est, quia hæc res tam secunde processit, nequid in consulendo adversi eveniat, quod nostras secundas res confutet ; neve hæc lætitia nimis luxuriose eveniat. Adversæ res se domant, et docent quid opus sit facto ; secundæ res lætitia transversum trudere solent a recte consulendo atque intelligendo. Quo majore opere edico suadeoque uti hæc res aliquot dies proferatur, dum ex tanto gaudio in potestatem nostram redeamus.

The opinion of so grave and venerable a senator as Cato, prevented a war against the Rhodians. The answer given them did not declare them enemies, nor treat them as allies, but continued them in suspense. They were ordered to remove their governors from the cities of Lycia and Caria. Those provinces were given up to them after the defeat of Antiochus, and now taken from them by way of punishment. They were ordered also to evacuate Caunus and Stratonice. They had bought the first for two hundred talents, about twenty five thousand pounds, of Ptolemy's general, and the second had been given them by Antiochus and Seleucus; they drew from those two cities an annual revenue of one hundred and twenty talents, or fifteen thousand pounds. At the same time the senate granted the island of Delos an exemption from customs, which considerably diminished the revenues of the Rhodians ; for, instead of one million of drachms, about twenty five thousand pounds sterling, to which the revenue from those customs amounted before, it paid afterwards only one hundred and fifty thousand, about three thousand seven hundred and fifty pounds sterling.

⁹ Qui acerrime adversus eos dicit, ita dicit; hostes voluisse fieri. Et quis tandem est nostrum, qui, quod ad sese attinet, æquum censeat quempiam pœnas dare ob eam rem, quod arguatur male facere voluisse? nemo, opinor; nam ego, quod ad me attinet, nolim.

^r Rhodienses superbos esse aiunt, id objectantes quod mihi a liberis meis minime deci velim. Sint sane superbi. Quid id ad nos attinet? Idne irascimini, si quis superior est quam nos?

The senate's answer, having dispelled at Rhodes the fear that the Romans would take up arms against the republic, made all other evils appear light, as it is common for the expectation of great misfortunes to make people next to insensible of small ones. How hard soever these orders were, they submitted to them, and put them in immediate execution. They decreed, at the same time, a crown of gold to the Romans, of the value of ten thousand pieces of gold,* and chose their admiral Theodotus, to present it. He had orders to solicit the alliance of the Romans. The Rhodians had not demanded it till then, though for almost one hundred and forty years they had shared in the most glorious expeditions of that republic ; which was a fetch of their politics. They were not for hampering their liberty with the chains of oaths and treaties ; that continuing free, and their own masters, they might either aid the kings in distress, or be supported by them upon occasion. In the present conjuncture, they earnestly demanded to be admitted as allies, not to secure themselves against other powers, for they were in no apprehensions of any besides the Romans; but to remove, by that change, all suspicions that might have been conceived to the prejudice of their republic. The alliance was not, however, granted them at this time. They did not obtain it till the following year; nor then, without long and warm solicitations. Tiberius Gracchus, at his return from Asia, whither he had been sent in quality of commissioner, to examine into its condition, was of great service to them upon this occasion. He declared that the Rhodians had punctually obeyed the senate's orders, and had condemned the partisans of Perseus to death. After so favourable a report, the Rhodians were admitted into the alliance of the Roman people.

* This might amount to about six thousand pounds, reckoning the piece of gold, χρυσός, at twelve shillings, or thereabouts.

I have before observed,^c that the Etolians had presented themselves before Paulus Emilius in mourning habits, at his return from his expedition into Greece, and that he had given them audience at Amphipolis. The subject of their complaints was, that Lycischus and Tisippus, whom the credit of the Romans, to whose interests they were devoted, rendered very powerful in Etolia, had surrounded the senate with soldiers, lent them by Bibius, who commanded in the province for the Romans; that they had put to death five hundred and fifty of the principal persons of the nation, whose sole crime was their having seemed to favour Perseus; that a great number of others had been sent into banishment, and that the estates both of the one and the other had been abandoned to their accusers. The inquiry was confined to knowing, not on which side the injustice and violence had been committed, but whether the parties concerned had been for Perseus or the Romans. The murderers were acquitted. The dead were declared to have been killed, and the exiles to have been banished, justly. Bibius only was condemned for having lent his aid in this bloody execution ; but why condemned, if it was just ? Or if not, why were those acquitted who had been the principal authors of it ?

E.

^c Liv. l. xlv. n. 28, 32.

This sentence gave great terror to all who had expressed any inclination for Perseus, and exceedingly increased the pride and insolence of the partisans of Rome. The principal persons of each city were divided into three factions. The one were entirely devoted to the Romans ; others adhered to the party of the kings ; both making their court to their protectors by abject flatteries, and thereby rendering themselves powerful in their cities, which they held in an oppressive subjection. A third kind of citizens, in opposition to the other two, observed a kind of medium, neither taking part with the Romans nor the kings, but publicly asserting the defence of their laws and liberty. The latter, at bottom, were much esteemed and beloved in their several cities, but were in no authority. All offices, embassies, honours, and rewards, were conferred solely upon those who espoused the Roman interests, after the defeat of Perseus ; and they employed their credit in utterly destroying all those who differed from themselves in opinion.

In this view they repaired in great numbers, from all parts of Greece, to the ten commissioners, appointed by the senate to regulate affairs. They gave them to understand, that besides those who had declared publicly for Perseus, there were abundance of others, secretly the enemies of Rome, who, under the colour of asserting liberty, influenced the whole people against them, and that those cities would never continue quiet, and perfectly subject to the Romans, unless, after the contrary party were entirely reduced, the authority of those who had only the interest of the commonwealth at heart, was fully established. The ten commissioners perfectly relished those reasons, and made them the rule of their conduct. What justice could be expected from an assembly that was determined to consider, and treat as criminals, all who were not of the Roman party, and to reward all who should declare themselves their accusers and enemies, with abundant graces and favours? We see here to what lengths ambition and the lust of empire carry mankind. They make men blind to all sense of duty and decency, and induce them to sacrifice justice, as well as every thing else, when it opposes their views. The virtue of the Pagans was but a weak, and very fluctuating principle.

That appears evidently upon this occasion. The Roman general, to whom a list had been given of all those who were suspected, ordered them to attend him from Etolia, Acarnania, Epirus, and Beotia, and to follow him to Rome, there to make their defence. Commissioners were sent also into Asia, in order to take informations against such as, in public or private, had favoured Perseus.

^u Of all the small states of Greece, none gave the Roman republic so much umbrage as the Achean league, which, till then had continued formidable, by the number and valor of their troops ; by the ability of their generals ; and, above all, by the union that reigned between all the cities of which it was composed. The Romans, jealous of a power that might prove an obstacle to their ambitious designs, especially if they should join the king of Macedonia, or the king of Syria, spared no pains to weaken it by introducing divisions, and gaining creatures, whom they raised by their credit to all employments, and by whose means they decided in all the assemblies of the league. We have seen what passed in the affair of the Spartan exiles ; but it was in the conjuncture we now speak of, the Romans gave the last stroke to their liberty.

^u A. M. 3837. Ant. J. C. 167. Liv. l. xlv. n. 31. Pausan. in Achaic. p. 416, 417.

After the defeat of Perseus, Callicrates, to complete with the Romans, to whom he had sold himself, the ruin of the partisans of liberty, whom he looked upon as his enemies, had the boldness to accuse by name all those to the ten commissioners, whom he suspected to have had any inclination to support Perseus. They did not think it would suffice to write to the Achæans, as they had done to other states, that they should send such of their citizens to Rome, as were accused of having favoured Perseus ; but they sent two deputies to declare in person that order to the league. Two reasons induced them to act in this manner. The first was, their fear that the Achæans, who were very jealous of their liberty, and full of valor, should refuse obedience to the letters that should be written them ; and that Callicrates, and the other informers, would run the risk of their lives in the assembly ; the second, because in the letters which had been found among Perseus's papers, nothing appeared to convict the accused Achæans.

The two commissioners sent into Achaia, were C. Claudius and Cn. Domitius Enobarbus. One of them, more abandoned to injustice than the other, Pausanias does not say which, complained in the assembly, that many of the most powerful persons of the league had assisted Perseus against the Romans, and demanded, that they should be condemned as deserving death, after which he should name them. The whole assembly was shocked at this proposal, and cried out on all sides, that it was an unheard of thing to condemn persons before it was declared who they were, and pressed him to make known the guilty. Upon repeated instances to explain himself, he replied, at the suggestion of Callicrates, that all who had been in office, and commanded the armies, had been guilty of that crime. Xenon, upon that, who was a person of great credit, and very much respected by the league, spoke to this effect ; " I have commanded the armies, and have had the honour to be chief magistrate of the league ; I protest, that I have never acted in any thing contrary to the interests of the Romans, which I am ready to prove either in the assembly of the Achæans, or at Rome before the senate." The Romans took hold of this expression, as favourable to his designs, and decreed, that all those who had been charged by Callicrates, should be sent to Rome, in order to justify themselves there. The whole assembly was in the highest affliction upon this sentence. Nothing like it had ever been known, even under Philip, or his son Alexander. Those princes, though irresistibly powerful, never conceived the thought of causing such as opposed them to be brought into Macedonia, but referred the trying of them to the council of the amphictyons, their natural judges. The Romans did not imitate their moderation ; but by a conduct, which may justly be called tyrannical, caused about one thousand of the most considerable citizens of the Achean league to be seized and conveyed to Rome. Callicrates became more than ever the object of horror and detestation to all the Achæans. All people avoided meeting him, and shunned his presence as an infamous traitor ; and no one would bathe in the public baths after him, till all the water had been first emptied out of them.

Polybius, the celebrated historian, was of the number of these exiles. We have seen Lycortas, his father, distinguish himself by the fortitude and constancy with which he supported the interests of the Achean league, during his government of it. He had taken particular care of the education of his son. In regard to policy, Polybius had Lycortas his father, a great statesman, for his master ; and for war, Philopemen, one of the most able and intrepid generals of antiquity. It was under these tutors he imbibed those learned lessons of government and war, which he practised himself, and has transmitted to posterity in his writings.

As soon as he arrived at Rome, whither his reputation had reached before him, his merit made the greatest men of the republic cultivate his friendship. He was particularly intimate with the two sons of Paulus Emilius, the eldest of whom had been adopted into the family of the Fabii, and the youngest into that of the Scipios. The latter had been adopted by P. Cornelius Scipio, son of Scipio Africanus, who conquered Hannibal. I have enlarged sufficiently, in the conclusion of the history of the Carthaginians, upon the intimate friendship of Polybius with this second son of Paulus Emilius, who afterwards conquered Carthage and Numantia. That young Roman perceived the value of such a friend, and knew how to apply his lessons and counsels to the best advantage. It is very probable, that Polybius composed the greatest part of his history, or at least collected his materials for it at Rome.

When the Acheans arrived at Rome, the senate, without hearing or examining their cause, supposing, without any foundation, and contrary to the most known truth, that they had been tried and sentenced in the assembly of the Acheans, banished them into different towns of Italy. Polybius was excepted from that number.

† The Acheans, surprised and afflicted with the fate of their countrymen, sent deputies to Rome, to demand that the senate would vouchsafe to take cognizance of their cause. They were answered, that it had been done, and that they had adjudged it themselves. Upon that reply, the Acheans sent back the same deputies to Rome, with Eureas at their head, to protest again before the senate, that those Acheans had never been heard by their country, and that their affair had never been brought to a trial. Eureas, in consequence, entered the senate with the other deputies who accompanied him, and declared the orders he had received, praying, that they would take cognizance of the accusation, and not suffer the accused to perish, without passing sentence upon the crime they were charged with ; that it were to be wished the senate would examine the affair themselves, and make known the guilty ; but, in case their other great affairs should not afford them leisure for such inquiry, they had only to refer it to the Acheans, who would do them justice in such a manner as should evidence the greatness of their aversion for the culpable. Nothing was more equitable than this demand, and the senate was very much at a loss how to answer it. On the one side, they did not think it proper to try the cause, for the accusation was groundless ; on the other, to dismiss the exiles, without passing judgment upon them, was to lose irrecoverably all their friends in Achaia. The senate, to leave the Greeks no hopes of retrieving their exiles, and to render them thereby more submissive to their orders, wrote into Achaia to Callicrates, and into the other states to the partisans of the Romans, that it did not appear to them, that the return of the exiles consisted with theirs, or the interest of their country. This answer not only threw the exiles, but all the people of Greece into consternation. An universal mourning succeeded it. They were convinced that there was nothing further to hope for the accused Acheans, and that their banishment was perpetual.

† Polyb. Leg. cv.

^w However, they sent new deputies, with instructions to demand the return of the exiles ; but, as suppliants, and as a favour, lest in taking upon them their defence, they should seem ever so little to oppose the will of the senate. There did not escape any thing in their harangue, that was not very well weighed, and sufficiently reserved ; notwithstanding which, the senate continued inflexible, and declared that they would persist in the regulations already made.

^x The Acheans would not be rejected ; and appointed several deputations at different times, but with no better success ; they were particularly ordered to demand the return of Polybius. They were in the right to persevere thus in their applications to the senate, in favour of their countrymen. Though their repeated instances had no other effect than to place the injustice of the Romans in full light, they could not be considered as unnecessary. Many of the senators were moved with them, and were of opinion that it was proper to send home the exiles.

^y The Acheans having received advice of this favourable disposition, in order to improve it to their advantage, appointed a last deputation. The exiles had been already banished seventeen years, and a great number of them were dead. There were very warm debates upon them in the senate ; some being for their return into their country, and their being restored to the possession of their estates ; and others opposing it. Scipio, at the request of Polybius, had solicited Cato in favour of the exiles. That grave senator rising up to speak in his turn, "To see us," said he, "dispute a whole day, whether some poor old men of Greece shall be interred by our grave diggers, or those of their own country, would not one believe that we had nothing at all to do?" That pleasantry was all that was wanting to make the senate ashamed of so long a contest, and to determine at last to send back the exiles into Peloponnesus. Polybius was for desiring that they might be reinstated in all the honours and dignities they possessed before their banishment; but, before he presented that request to the senate, he thought proper to sound Cato upon it, who told him, smiling, "Polybius, you do not imitate the wisdom of Ulysses. You are for returning into the cave of the Cyclops for some miserable tatters you have left there."² The exiles accordingly returned into their country; but of the thousand that left it, only about three hundred remained. Polybius made no use of this permission, or if he did, he soon rejoined Scipio, seeing three years after, he was with him at the siege of Carthage.

^w Polyb. Leg. cxxi.

^x A. M. 3844. Ant. J. C. 160. Polyb. Leg. cxxix, cxxx.

^y Plut. in Cato Cens. p. 341.

SECTION II.

ARIARATHES DIES, AND IS SUCCEEDED BY HIS SON. DEATH OF EUMENES. WAR BETWEEN ATTALUS AND PRUSIAS.

AFTER the defeat of Perseus, new embassies came every day to Rome, either to congratulate the Romans upon their victory, or to justify or excuse themselves for the attachment they seemed to have to that prince; and, some came to lay complaints before the senate in regard to some allies. We have seen hitherto what relates to the Rhodians and Achæans. In this section I shall collect what concerns Eumenes, king of Pergamus, Prusias, king of Bithynia, and some other particular affairs.

² A. M. 5854. Ant. J. C. 150.

* Prusias being come to Rome, to make the senate and Roman people his compliments of congratulation upon the good success of the war against Perseus, dishonoured the royal dignity by abject flattery. At his reception by the deputies appointed by the senate for that purpose, he appeared with his head shaved, and with the cap, habit, shoes, and stockings of a slave made free; and saluting the deputies, "You see," said he "one of your freedmen ready to fulfil whatsoever you shall please to command, and to conform entirely to all your customs." When he entered the senate, he stood at the door, facing the senators who sat, and prostrating himself, kissed the threshold. Afterwards, addressing himself to the assembly, "I salute you, gods, preservers," cried he; and went on with a discourse suitable to that prelude. Polybius says, that he should be ashamed to repeat it. He concluded with demanding, that the Roman people would renew the alliance with him, and grant him certain lands taken from Antiochus, of which the Gauls had possessed themselves without any right or pretension. He then recommended his son Nicomedes to them. All he asked was granted him; only commissioners were appointed to examine into the condition of the lands in question. Livy, in his account of this audience, omits the abject submissions of Prusias, of which he pretends the Roman historians say nothing ; he contents himself with mentioning in the conclusion, part of what Polybius had said before, and with some reason ; for, that base deportment at least dishonoured the senate as much, who suffered, as the prince who acted it.

* A. M. 3838. Ant. J. C. 166. Polyb. Leg. xcvi. Liv. l. xlv. n. 44.

^b Prusias had scarce left Rome, when advice came that Eumenes was upon the point of entering it. That news gave the senate some trouble. Eumenes, in the war against Perseus, had behaved in such a manner that they could neither continue him as a friend nor an enemy. There was reason for violent suspicions, but no certain proofs against him. To admit him to an audience, was to declare him innocent ; to condemn him as guilty, was to lay themselves under the necessity of a war with him, and to proclaim to all the world that they had failed in point of prudence, by loading a prince with fortunes and honours, whose character they were little acquainted with. To avoid these inconveniences, the senate made a decree, by which, under the pretext that the reception of kings was too great a charge to the republic, they forbade all kings in general to enter that city, and caused that ordinance to be signified to the king of Pergamus, who was at no loss to comprehend its meaning. He returned therefore into his own dominions.

^c This affront encouraged his enemies, and cooled the affection of his allies. Prusias sent an ambassador to Rome, to complain of the irruptions he made into Bithynia. He added, that Eumenes had secret intelligence with Antiochus ; that he treated all those injuriously who seemed to favour the Romans, and particularly the Gallo Grecians his neighbours, in contradiction to the senate's decrees in their behalf. That people had also sent deputies to Rome with their complaints ; which they afterwards repeated several times, as well as Prusias. The senate did not yet declare themselves. They contented themselves with aiding and supporting the Gallo Grecians, underhand, to the utmost of their power, without doing any manifest injustice to Eumenes.

^b Polyb. Leg. xvii.

^c A. M. 3839. Ant. J. C. 165. Polyb. Leg. xvii. cii, civ. cv. cvi. cxix. cxxi.

The king of Pergamus, who had been forbidden entrance into Rome, sent his brothers, Attalus and Atheneus thither, to answer the accusations he was charged with. The apology they made seemed finally to confute all complaints against the king, and the senate were so well satisfied with it, that they sent them back into Asia, laden with honours and presents. They did not, however, entirely efface the prejudices conceived against their brother. The senate despatched Sulpicius Gallus and Manius Sergius, with orders to inform themselves secretly, whether Antiochus and Eumenes were not concerting some design against the Romans.

^d Sulpicius acted in this commission with very great imprudence. He was a vain man, and aimed at appearing important, by declaring against Eumenes. When he arrived in Asia, he caused all the cities to be informed that such as had any complaints to make in regard to that prince, might repair to him at Sardis. And there for ten days he hearkened quietly to all the accusations people thought fit to form against Eumenes; a liberty that set all mal contents at work, and opened a door for all manner of calumnies!

^d Polyb. in Excerpt. Vales. p. 145.

^e Tiberius Gracchus, whom the senate sent the following year into Asia upon the same account, was received by Eumenes and Antiochus in a manner which convinced him there was nothing to fear from those two kings, and induced him to make his report to the senate accordingly. He gave as favourable an account of the conduct of Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, who had married the sister of Eumenes. That prince died some time after. His son Ariarathes, surnamed Philopater, succeeded him. He had him by Antiochis, the daughter of Antiochus the Great, and intended, when he came of age, to resign his kingdom to him, to which his son would never consent; from whence he was called Philopater, that is, lover of his father. An action highly laudable, in an age wherein it was no uncommon thing to acquire kingdoms by parricide.

^g As soon as the young king ascended the throne, he sent deputies to Rome, to demand that the treaty his father had made with the Romans should be renewed, which was granted him with praises.

^h Some time after, notwithstanding Eumenes aided him with all his forces, he was dethroned by Demetrius, king of Syria, and one of his elder brothers set in his place, who was a supposed son, named Holo-

^e A. M. 3840. Ant. J. C. 164.

^f A. M. 3842. Ant. J. C. 162. Diod. Eleg. p. 695.

^g Polyb. Leg. cxxi.

^h A. M. 3845. Ant. J. C. 159. Polyb. Leg. cxxvi.

fernes. ⁱ Ariarathes took refuge at Rome. The usurper and Demetrius sent their ambassadors also thither. The senate decreed that the two brothers should reign jointly. It was a policy sufficiently frequent with the Romans to divide kingdoms between brothers, in order to weaken them by that partition, and sow the seeds of eternal division between them. Attalus, in the first year of his reign, reestablished him in the sole possession of the throne, having conquered and expelled his competitor.

Eumenes was always suspected by the Romans, and almost continually at war with Prusias, or the Gallo Grecians. He died at length, after having reigned thirty eight years.^k He left for his successor^l in the kingdom his son Attalus, surnamed Philometer, then an infant, whom he had by Stratonice, sister of Ariarathes, and appointed guardian of his son, and regent of his kingdom, his brother Attalus Philadelphus, who governed the kingdom twenty one years.

Polybius bestows great praises on Eumenes. The body of that prince, says he, was weak and delicate, his soul great, and abounding with the most noble sentiments. He gave place to none of the kings,^m his contemporaries in many other qualities, and excelled them all in the nobleness of his inclinations. The kingdom of Pergamus, when he received it from his father, consisted only of a very small number of cities,

ⁱ A. M. 3847. Ant. J. C. 157.

^k Strabo says he reigned forty three years, but that is presumed to be an error.

^l Strab. l. xiii. p. 624.

^m Polyb. Exempt. Virt. et Vit. p. 166.

which scarce deserved that name. He rendered it so powerful, that it might have disputed preeminence with almost all the greatest kingdoms. He owed nothing either to chance or fortune; still using the words of Polybius. Every thing was the result of his prudence, labour, and activity. From his fondness for true glory, he did more good to Greece, and enriched more private persons, than any prince. To finish his character, he possessed so fully the art of engaging the respect of his three brothers, and of keeping them within bounds by his authority, without letting them perceive it, that though they were all of age and capacity to undertake for themselves, and shared with him in the functions of the sovereignty, they never failed in point of submission, but continued always in perfect union, and with equal zeal for his service, assisted him in defending and aggrandizing the kingdom. It would be difficult to find such an example of authority over brothers, joined with unalterable concord and union.

I ought not to omit one thing in this place, which does great honour to the memory of Eumenes; that is, his having founded the famous library of Pergamus, or at least considerably augmented it; but I shall speak of that elsewhere.

▪ The division which had almost perpetually subsisted between Prusias and Eumenes, continued under Attalus, who succeeded the latter. Prusias, having been victorious in a battle, entered Pergamus, and violently enraged and afflicted that he had failed of seizing Attalus, let fall the weight of his revenge upon the statues and temples of the gods ; burning and destroying all before him in his march. ° Attalus sent his brother Atheneus to Rome, to implore the aid of the senate, who sent several embassies at different times to forbid Prusias to continue the war against Attalus ; but he eluded these orders, either by delays or even treachery, having once attempted, under pretence of an interview, to seize the Roman ambassador and Attalus. His design was discovered, and the execution of it prevented ; but his crime was not the less upon that account. Rome at other times would have punished it with the destruction of his kingdom. At this she was contented with sending ten commissioners, with instructions to put an end to this war, and to oblige Prusias to make Attalus satisfaction for the damages he had done him. Attalus, however, with the aid of his allies, had assembled numerous armies both by sea and land. All things were prepared for opening the campaign, when news came that the commissioners were arrived. Attalus joined them. After some conferences upon the present affair, they set out for Bithynia, where they declared to Prusias the orders they were charged with from the senate. That prince was willing to accept part of the conditions prescribed him, but refused to comply with most of the rest. The commissioners, exasperated at his rejecting them, broke the alliance and amity with him, and resuming immediately their route to Pergamus, left Prusias in terrible apprehensions. They advised Attalus to keep with his army upon the frontiers of his kingdom, without being the first to commit hostilities ; and some of them returned to Rome to inform the senate of the rebellion of Prusias. At length he opened his eyes, and new commissioners from Rome obliged him to lay down his arms, and sign a treaty of peace, which they presented him. This treaty imported, that Prusias should give immediately twenty decked ships to Attalus ; that he should pay him five hundred talents, five hundred thousand crowns, in the space of twenty years ; that the two kings should keep within the bounds of their own dominions, such as they stood before the war ; that Prusias, in reparation of the damages he had done upon the lands of some neighbouring cities, which were named, should pay them one hundred talents, one hundred thousand crowns. When he had accepted and signed these conditions, Attalus drew off his troops, both by sea and land, into his own kingdom. In this manner ended the war, occasioned by the differences between Attalus and Prusias.

▪ A. M. 3848. Ant. J. C. 156. Polyb. Leg. cxxviii. cxxix. cxxxii. cxxxv. cxxxvi.

^p Attalus the younger, son of Eumenes, when the peace was concluded between the two states, made a voyage to Rome in order to make himself known to the senate, to demand the continuance of their amity, and, without doubt, to thank them also for the protection, they had granted his uncle, who reigned in his name. He received from the senate all the marks of favour he could have expected, and all the honours suitable to his years ; after which he set out for his dominions.

^p Polyb. Leg. cxl.

Prusias also sent afterwards his son Nicomedes to Rome, and knowing that he was highly considered there, he gave him instructions to demand that the senate would remit him the remainder of the sum he was to pay Attalus. He joined Menas with him in this embassy, to whom he had given secret orders to despatch the young prince, in order to advance his children by a second wife. The favour demanded by Prusias was refused, Attalus's ambassadors demonstrating, that the whole sum was far from being equal to the losses his master had sustained from him. Menas, instead of executing the horrid commission he was charged with, discovered the whole to Nicomedes. The young prince having quitted Rome to return into Bithynia,^r thought it incumbent on him to prevent the murderous designs of his father. Supported by the assistance of Attalus, he revolted against him, and drew over the greatest part of the people to his party ; for Prusias was universally hated for his oppressions and cruelties. That unfortunate prince, abandoned by all his subjects, took refuge in a temple, where he was slain by soldiers, sent by Nicomedes, or, according to some, by Nicomedes himself. What horrors on each side ! Prusias was called the Hunter, and had reigned at least thirty six years. It was with him Hannibal had taken refuge.

This king of Bithynia's person ^s had nothing in it to prejudice people in his favour, nor was his mind more to his advantage. He was in size but half a man, and a mere woman as to valor and bravery. He was not only timorous, but soft, and incapable of fatigue ; in a word, equally effeminate in mind and body ; defects by no means amiable in a king, and least of all amongst the Bithynians. Polite learning, philosophy, and all other liberal knowledge, were entirely foreign to him. In short, he had no manner of idea of the good and great, the noble and the elegant. Night and day he lived a true Sardanapalus ; so that his subjects, upon the first dawn of hope, joined with the utmost ardour in measures against him, and to punish him in the same manner he had governed them.

^q A. M. 3855. Ant. J. C. 149. Appian. in Mithrid. p. 175. Justin. l. xxxiv. c. 4.

^r A. M. 3856. Ant. J. C. 148.

^s Polyb. in Excerpt. p. 173, 174.

I have deferred speaking of two embassies, which arrived at Rome very near the same time.

The one came from the Athenians, who having been condemned by a sentence passed on them by the Sicyonians,^t but under the authority of the Roman senate, in a fine of five hundred talents, for having laid waste the lands of the city of Oropus, sent to demand the remission of that fine. The ambassadors were three celebrated philosophers ; Carneades, of the sect of the academics ; Diogenes, of the stoics, and Critolaus, of the peripatetics. The taste for eloquence and philosophy had not yet made its way so far as Rome ; it was about the time of which we are speaking, that it began to spread there, and the reputation of these three philosophers did not a little contribute to it. The young people of Rome who had any taste for the sciences, made it their honour and amusement to visit them, and were struck with admiration on hearing them, especially Carneades, whose lively and graceful eloquence, in which solidity and ornament were united, transported and enchanted them. It was universally talked, that a Greek of extraordinary merit was arrived, who, from his great knowledge was more than man, and who, in calming and softening the most violent passions by his eloquence, inspired youth with a kind of love, which made them renounce all other pleasures and enjoyments, to abandon themselves wholly to philosophy. He had for his auditors all the most considerable persons of Rome. His discourses, translated into Latin by one of the senators, were in all hands. All Rome saw, with great joy, their children apply themselves to the Grecian learning, and inseparable from these wonderful men. Cato only seemed sorry for it; apprehending that this taste for polite learning would extinguish that for military knowledge, and that they would prefer the glory of speaking, to that of acting well. The example of the second Scipio Africanus, educated at the same time, under the care of Polybius, in a taste for the sciences, demonstrates how ill founded that prejudice of Cato's was. However it were, he warmly reproached the senators for keeping the ambassadors so long in the city; and having caused the affair that brought them thither to be despatched, he hastened their departure. By a decree of the senate, the fine, in which they had been condemned, was moderated, and the five hundred talents reduced to one hundred.

^t A. M. 3849. Ant. J. C. 155. Cic. l. ii. de. Orat. n. 155. Aul. Gel. l. vii. c. 14.

The other embassy was sent by the people of Marseilles.^a They had already been often harassed by the Ligurians, but at the time of which we now speak, they were reduced to the last extremities, and sent ambassadors to Rome, to implore aid of the senate. They came to a resolution to send deputies to the Ligurians, to incline them to sentiments of peace and equity by the method of amity and negotiation. Such conduct made them only the more haughty, and they carried their insolence so far as to offer indignities to the deputies, and to violate the law of nations in their persons. The senate, being informed of this unhappy affair, made the consul Quintius Opimius march immediately against them with an army. He laid siege to the city where the insult had been offered to the Roman ambassadors,^v took it by storm, made slaves of the inhabitants, and sent the principal authors of the affront bound and fettered to Rome, to be punished there according to their deserts. The Ligurians were beat and cut to pieces in several battles. The victor distributed all the conquered lands amongst the people of Marseilles. He ordered the Ligurians to send hostages to Marseilles, which were to be exchanged for others from time to time; in order to lay a curb upon them, and prevent them from molesting the people of Marseilles, as they had done till then.

^a Polyb. Leg. cxxxii. et. cxxxiv.

Rome had always held the people of Marseilles, in extreme consideration, founded upon their extraordinary merit, and the inviolable fidelity with which they had constantly adhered to the party of the Romans. They were by origin of Phocæa,^w a city of Ionia. When Xerxes sent Harpagus to besiege it, the inhabitants, rather than submit to the yoke of the barbarians, as so many others had done, embarked with their wives and children, and all their effects, and after various adventures, having cast a mass of red hot iron into the sea, they all engaged themselves by oath never to return into Phoea, till that iron should swim upon the water. Afterwards having landed upon the coast of Gaul, near the mouth of the Rhone, they settled there, by the consent of the king of the country, and built a city, since called Marseilles. This foundation is said to have been made in the reign of Tarquinius Priscus, about the second year of the forty fifth Olympiad, and six hundred years before the birth of Jesus Christ.

^v Egitna.

^w Herod. l. i. c. 164. Justin. l. xliii. c. 3.

The king, who had received them into his dominions with great goodness, being dead, his son ^x did not show them so much favour. The growing power of their city gave him umbrage. He was made to understand, that those strangers, whom he had received into his country, as guests and suppliants, might one day make themselves masters of it by right of conquest. The fable of the bitch was made use of upon this occasion, that asked her companion to lend her house only for eight days, till she had brought forth her whelps ; then by great entreaties obtained a second term to bring them up ; and at last, when they were grown large and strong, made herself absolute mistress and proprietor of the place, from whence she could never afterwards be expelled. The Marseillians had, in consequence, at first a rude war upon their hands ; but having been victorious, they continued in quiet possession of the lands that had been granted them, within the bounds of which they were not long confined.

In process of time they settled several colonies ^y and built several cities ; Agde, Nice, Antibas, Olbia ; which much extended their territory, and augmented their power. They had ports, arsenals, and fleets, that rendered them formidable to their enemies. So many new settlements ^z contributed to the spreading of the Greeks in Gaul, and occasioned a wonderful change in them. The Gauls, quitting their ancient rusticity by degrees, began to be civilized, and to assume more gentle manners. Instead of breathing nothing but war, they accustomed themselves to the observance of the laws of a wise government. They learned to improve their lands, to cultivate vines, and to plant olives.^a Hence so surprising an alteration ensued, as well in the provinces as the people who inhabited them, that it might have been said, Greece was not come to Gaul, but Gaul had been changed into Greece.

^x Justin. l. xliii. c. 4.

^y Strab. p. 180.

^b The inhabitants of the new city made very wise laws for its policy and government, which was aristocratical, that is to say, in the hands of the elders. The council of the city was composed of six hundred senators, who continued in that function during life. Of that number fifteen were elected to take care of the current affairs, and three to preside in the assemblies in quality of principal magistrates.

^c The right of hospitality was in singular estimation amongst the Marscellians, and practised by them with the most exalted humanity. To maintain the security of the asylum they gave to strangers, no person was suffered to enter the city with arms. Certain persons were placed at the gates, whose business it was to take

^z Justin. l. xliii. c. 4.

^a Adeo magnus et hominibus et rebus impositus est nitor, ut non Græciæ in Galliam emigrasse, sed Gallia in Græciam translata videretur. Justin.

^b Strab. l. iv. p. 179.

^c Val. Max. l. ii. c. 6.

care of the arms of all who came in, and to return them when they went out.

All entrance was barred to such as might have been for introducing sloth and a voluptuous life; and particular care was taken to banish all double dealing, falsehood, and fraud.

^d They piqued themselves, especially upon sobriety, modesty, and frugality. The most considerable portion amongst them did not exceed one hundred pieces of gold, that is to say, very near one hundred pistoles. They were not allowed to lay out more than five in dress, and as many in jewels. Valerius Maximus,^e who lived in the reign of Tiberius, admires the regulations of government observed at Marseilles, in his time. "That city," says he, "steadfastly retaining the ancient severity of manners,^f excluded from their theatre those comedians whose pieces generally turn upon the subject of unlawful love." The reason given for this maxim is still finer and more remarkable than the maxim itself. "Lest," adds the author, "a familiarity with such sort of shows should make the people more apt to imitate them."

They would not admit in funeral ceremonies, those indecent tears and lamentations with which they are generally attended, and ordered them to cease the same day, by a domestic sacrifice, and an entertainment for the friends and relations of the deceased; ^g "For is

^d Strab. l. iv. p. 181.

^e Lib. ii. c. 6.

^f Eadem civitas severitatis custos acerrima est; nullum aditum in scenam mimis dando, quorum argumenta majore ex parte stuprorum continent actus, ne talia spectandi consuetudo etiam imitandi licentiam sumat.

^g Etenim quid attinent, aut humano dolori indulgeri, aut divino numini invidiam fieri, quod immortalitatem suam nobiscum partiri noluerit?

it consistent to abandon ourselves to immoderate affliction, or to be offended at the Divinity for not having thought fit to share his immortality with us ?”

Tacitus has a passage upon the city of Marseilles highly in its praise ; it is in his life of Julius Agricola, his father in law. After having spoken of the excellent education he had received from the care and tender affection of Julia Procilla his mother,^b a lady of extraordinary virtue, who made him pass the most early years of his youth in the study of those arts and sciences that suited his birth and age ; he adds, “ What had preserved him from the dangers and disorders, to which youth in general are exposed, was, besides his his own genius and disposition, the good fortune of having from his infancy the city of Marseilles for his school, in the manners of whose inhabitants the politeness of the Greeks, and the simplicity and reserve of the provinces, were happily united.” Arcebat eum ab illecebris peccantium, præter ipsius bonam integramque naturam, quod statim parvulus sedem ac magistram studiorum Massiliam habuerit, locum Græca comitate et provinciali parsimonia mistum ac bene compositum.

From what I have said may be seen, that Marseilles was become a celebrated school for politeness, wisdom, and virtue, and at the same time for all arts and sciences. Eloquence, philosophy, physic, mathematics, law, fabulous theology, and all kinds of literature, were publicly professed there. This city produced the most ancient of the learned men of the west, I mean

^b Mater Julia Procilla fuit, raræ castitatis. In hujus sinu indulgentiaque educatus, per omnem honestarum artium cultum, pueritiam, adolescentiamque transegit. Tacit. in Agricol. c. iv.

¹ Voss. in Histor. Græc.

Pytheas, an excellent geographer and astronomer, who lived in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus, or indeed of Alexander the Great.

They persevered constantly in cultivating the arts and sciences with equal ardour and success. Strabo relates, that in his time, he lived in the reign of Augustus, the young nobility of Rome went to Marseilles for education ; and he prefers that place to the city of Athens itself ; which is saying a great deal. We have already seen that it retained that privilege in the time of Tacitus the historian.

The Marseillians distinguished themselves no less by the wisdom of their government, than by their capacity and taste for learning. Cicero, in one of his orations, exceedingly magnifies their manner of governing their republic. ^k “ I am assured,” says he, “that not only in Greece, but in all other nations, there is nothing comparable to the wise polity established at Marseilles. That city, so remote from the country, manners, and language of all other Greeks situated in Gaul, in the midst of barbarous nations that surround it on all sides, is so prudently directed by the counsels of its elders, that it is more easy to praise, than imitate, the wisdom of its government.”

They laid it down as a fundamental rule of their politics,^l from which they never departed, to adhere inviolably to the Romans, to whose manners their own were more conformable, than to those of the barbarians around them. Beside which, their neighbourhood to the Ligurians, of whom they were equally enemies, could not but contribute to unite them by their common interests ; that union enabling each party to make powerful diversions on both sides of the Alps. They accordingly rendered the Romans great services at all times, and also received considerable aids from them upon many occasions.

^k Cujus ego civitatis disciplinam atque gravitatem, non solum Græciæ sed haud scio an cunctis gentibus, anteponendam jure dicam ; quæ tam procul a Græcorum omnium regionibus, disciplinis, linguaque divisa, cum in ultimis terris cincta Gallorum gentibus, barbariæ fluctibus alluatur, sic optimatum consilio gubernatur, ut omnes ejus instituta laudare facilius possint, quam æmulari. Orat. pro Flacco. n. 63.

^l Strab. l. iv. p. 180.

^m Justin relates a fact, which would be very much to the honour of the Marseillians, if it were well confirmed. Having received advice, that the Gauls had taken and burnt Rome, they deplored that disaster of their allies, as much as if it had happened to their own city. Nor did they confine themselves to fruitless tears. Out of the gold and silver, either of the public or private persons, they raised the sum in which the Gauls had taxed the conquered, as the price of peace, and sent it to Rome. ⁿ The Romans, infinitely affected with so noble an act of generosity, granted Marseilles the privilege of immunity, and the right of sitting amongst the senators at the public shows. It is certain, that during the war with Hannibal, Marseilles aided the Romans with all manner of good offices ; the ill successes which they experienced in the first years of the war, and which had deprived them of almost all their allies, not being capable of shaking their fidelity in the least.

^m Justin. l. xliii. c. 5.

ⁿ Liv. l. xxi. n. 20—25, 26. Lib. xxvi. n. 19. Lib. xxvii. n. 36.

In the civil war between Cesar and Pompey, that city observed a conduct which well denotes the wisdom of its government. ° Cesar, against whom they had shut their gates, caused the fifteen senators, who were in supreme authority, to come to his camp, and represented to them, that he was sorry the war should begin by attacking their city ; that they ought rather to submit to the authority of all Italy, than to abandon themselves blindly to the desires of one man ; and he added all the motives most capable of persuading them. After having made their report to the senate, they returned into the camp, and gave Cesar this answer ;^p that they knew the Roman people were divided into two parties ; that it did not belong to them to determine which had the right on their side ; that the two heads of these parties were equally the protectors of their city ; and at the same time its friends and benefactors ; that, for this reason, obliged to express their gratitude alike for both, it was incumbent upon them neither to assist, nor receive the one into their city or ports, to the prejudice of the other. ^q They suffered a long siege, in which they showed all possible valor ; but at length, the extreme necessity to which they were reduced, by the want of every thing, obliged them to surrender. However enraged Cesar was at so obstinate a resistance, he could not refuse to the ancient reputation of the city, the favour of saving it from being plundered, and of preserving its citizens.

° Cæs. in Bel. Civ. l. i.

^p Intelligere se divisum esse populum in partes duas ; neque sui iudicii, neque suarum virium discernere utra pars justiore habeat causam ; principes vero earum esse partium Cn. Pompeium et C. Cæsarem patronos civitatis. Paribus eorum beneficiis, parem se quoque voluntatem tribuere debere, et neutrum eorum contra alterum juvare, aut urbe aut portibus recipere.

^q Cæs. in Bel. Civ. l. ii.

I should have believed myself wanting in some measure to the glory of the French nation, and to that of a city which holds one of the highest ranks in the kingdom, if I had not collected in this place, part of those favourable reports, antiquity makes of it. I hope the reader will pardon this digression; which besides comes into my plan, and is part of the Grecian history.

The affairs of Greece, Bithynia, Pergamus, and some other countries, which I thought it necessary to treat in a series, and without interruption, have made me suspend those of Macedonia, Syria, and Egypt; to which it is now time to return. I shall begin with Macedonia.

SECTION III.

ANDRISCUS, PRETENDED SON OF PERSEUS, CAUSES HIMSELF TO BE PROCLAIMED KING OF MACEDONIA.

FIFTEEN or sixteen years after the defeat and death of Perseus, Andriscus of Adramytta, a city of Troas in Asia Minor, a person of the meanest birth, giving himself out for the son of Perseus, took upon him the name of Philip, and entered Macedonia, in hopes of making the inhabitants of the country acknowledge him for their king. He had invented a story in regard to his birth, which he reported wherever he passed, pretending that he was the son of Perseus by a concubine, and that the prince his father had caused him to be secretly brought up at Adramytta, that in case of ill fortune in the war against the Romans, some shoot of the royal line might remain ; that after the death of Perseus, he had been nurtured and brought up at Adramytta, till he was twelve years of age, and that the person who passed for his father, finding himself at the point of death, had revealed the secret to his wife, and intrusted her with a writing, signed by Perseus with his own hand, which attested all that has been said ; which writing she was to deliver him, Philip, as soon as he should attain to the years of discretion. He added, that her husband having conjured her absolutely to conceal the affair till then, she had been most faithful in keeping the secret, and had delivered that important writing to him at the appointed time ; pressing him to quit the country before the report should reach the ears of Eumenes, the declared enemy of Perseus, lest he should cause him to be put to death. He was in hopes that he should be believed upon his own word, and make Macedonia rise in his favour. When he saw that all continued quiet, he retired into Syria, to the court of Demetrius Soter, whose sister Perseus had espoused. That prince, who immediately perceived the fraud, caused him to be seized and sent to Rome.

• A. M. 3852. Ant. J. C. 152. Epiton, Liv. l. 43—50. Zonar. ex Dione, l. i. c. 11. Florus, l. ii. c. 14.

As he did not produce any proof of his pretended nobility, and had nothing in his mien or manners that expressed the prince, no great notice was taken of him at Rome, and he was treated with great contempt, without much trouble to keep a strict guard upon him, or to confine him close. He took the advantage of the negligence of his guards, and made his escape from Rome. Having found means to raise a considerable army amongst the Thracians, who entered into his views for the sake of delivering themselves, by his means, from the Roman yoke, he made himself master of Macedonia, either by consent or force, and assumed the marks of the royal dignity. Not content with this first conquest, which had cost him little, he attacked Thessaly, and subjected a part of it to his obedience.

The affair then began to seem more important to the Romans. They elected Scipio Nasica to go thither, and appease this tumult in its birth, deeming him well qualified for that commission. He had, indeed, the art of managing men's minds, and of bringing them into his measures by persuasion ; and, if he should find it necessary to decide this affair by arms, he was very capable of forming a project with wisdom, and executing it with valor. As soon as he arrived in Greece, and had been fully informed of the state of affairs in Macedonia and Thessaly, he gave the senate advice of them ; and, without loss of time, visited the cities of the allies, in order to the immediate raising of troops for the defence of Thessaly. The Achæans, who continued at that time the most powerful people of Greece, supplied him with the greatest number, forgetting past subjects of discontent. He presently took from the false Philip all the places he had possessed himself of in Thessaly, and drove him back into Macedonia.

• However, it was well known at Rome, from Scipio's letters, that Macedonia had occasion for a speedy support. The pretor, P. Juventius Thalna, had orders to repair thither as soon as possible with an army, which he did without loss of time. But looking upon Andriscus as only a pageant king, he did not think it incumbent upon him to take any great precautions against him, engaged precipitately in a battle, wherein he lost his life, with part of his army; the rest saving themselves only by favour of the night. The victor, elated with this success, and believing his authority sufficiently established, abandoned himself to his vicious inclinations without any moderation or reserve; as if the being truly a king consisted in knowing no law nor rule of conduct but his passions. He was covetous, proud, insolent and cruel. Nothing was seen every where but violence, confiscations of estates and murders. Taking the advantage of the terror occasioned by the defeat of the Roman army, he soon recovered all he had lost in Thessaly. An embassy sent to him from the Carthaginians, who were at that time actually at war with the Romans, very much augmented his courage.

Q. Cecilius Metellus, lately elected pretor, had succeeded Juventius. Andriscus had resolved to advance to meet him, but did not think it proper to remove far from the sea, and halted at Pydna, where he fortified his camp. The Roman pretor soon followed him. The two armies were in view of each other, and skirmished every day. Andriscus gained an advantage sufficiently considerable in a small combat of the cavalry. Success generally blinds and proves fatal to people of little experience. Andriscus, believing himself superior to the Romans, sent off a great detachment to defend his conquests in Thessaly. This was a gross error ; and Metellus, whose vigilance nothing escaped, did not fail to take the advantage of it. The army that remained in Macedonia was beat, and Andriscus obliged to fly. He retired amongst the Thracians, from whom he returned soon after with another army. He was so rash as to hazard another battle, which was still less successful than the former. He had above twenty five thousand men killed in these two battles ; and nothing was wanting to the Roman glory but to seize Andriscus, who had taken refuge with a petty king of Thrace, to whose fidelity he had abandoned himself. But the Thracians did not stand much upon breach of faith, and made that the means to their interest. That prince delivered up his guest and suppliant into the hands of Metellus, to avoid drawing upon himself the wrath and arms of the Romans. Andriscus was sent to Rome.

Another adventurer, who also called himself the son of Perseus, and took upon him the name of Alexander, had the same fate with the first, except being seized by Metellus ; he retired into Dardania, where he effectually concealed himself.

It was at this time Macedonia was entirely subjected to the Romans, and reduced into a province.

A third usurper, some years after, appeared again, and set himself up as the son of Perseus, under the name of Philip. His pretended royalty was but of short duration. He was overcome, and killed in Macedonia by Tremellius, afterwards surnamed Scrofa, from having said that he would disperse the enemy, ut Scrofa Porcos.

SECTION IV.

TROUBLES IN ACHAIA. METELLUS AND MUMMIUS SETTLE THOSE TROUBLES. THE LATTER TAKES CORINTH, AND DESTROYS IT.

‘METELLUS, after having pacified Macedonia, continued there some time. Great commotions had arisen amongst the Achæans of the league, occasioned by the temerity and avarice of those who held the first offices. The resolutions of their assemblies were no longer guided by reason, prudence and equity ; but, by the interests and passions of the magistrates, and the blind caprice of an untractable multitude. The Achæan league and Sparta, had sent ambassadors to Rome, upon an affair about which they were divided. Damocritus, notwithstanding, who was the supreme magistrate of the Achæans, had caused war to be declared against Sparta. Metellus had sent to desire that hostilities might cease till the arrival of the commissioners from Rome, who were appointed for terminating their differences. But neither he, nor Dieus who succeeded him, paid any regard to that request. Both of them entered Laconia with their troops, and laid waste the country.

The commissioners being arrived, the assembly was summoned to Corinth. Aurelius Orestes was at the head of the commission. The senate had given them orders to weaken the body of the league ; and, for that end, to separate as many cities as they could from it. Orestes notified to the assembly the decree of the senate ; whereby Sparta, Corinth, Argos, Heraclea, near mount Oeta, and Orchomenos of Arcadia, were secluded from the league, under pretence that those cities did not originally compose a part of the body of the Achæans. When the deputies quitted the assembly, and reported this decree to the multitude, they grew furious, and fell upon all the Lacedæmonians they found in Corinth ; tore those out of the house of the commissioners who had taken refuge there ; and, would have treated themselves no better, had they not escaped their violence by flight.

‘ A. M. 3857. Ant. J. C. 147. Pausan. in Achaïac. p. 421—428. Polyb. Leg. cxliiii. cxliv. Id. in Excerpt. de Virt. et Vit. p. 181—189½ Justin. l. xxxiv. c. 1. Flor. l. ii. c. 16.

Orestes and his colleagues, on their return to Rome, gave an account of what had passed. The senate was highly incensed at it, and immediately deputed Julius, with some other commissioners, into Achaia ; but instructed them to complain with moderation, and only to exhort the Achæans not to give ear to bad counsels, lest by their imprudence they should incur disgrace with the Romans ; a misfortune it was in their power to avoid, by punishing those who had exposed them to it. Carthage was not yet taken, so that it was necessary to act with caution in regard to allies so powerful as the Achæans. The commissioners met, on their way, a deputy sent by the seditious to Rome ; they carried him back with them to Egium, where the diet of the nation had been summoned to assemble. They spoke in it with great moderation and kindness. They did not let slip a single word in their discourse concerning the ill treatment of the commissioners, or excused it better than the Achæans themselves would have done; and were as reserved, in regard to the cities they had been for separating from the league. They confined themselves to exhorting them not to aggravate their first fault, nor to irritate the Romans any further; and to leave Lacedæmonia in peace. Such moderate remonstrances were extremely agreeable to all the persons of sense in the assembly; but Dieus, Critolaus, and their faction, all chosen out of the vilest, most impious, and most pernicious persons in each city, blew up the flame of discord; insinuating, that the lenity of the Romans proceeded only from the bad condition of their affairs in Africa, where they had been worsted in several engagements, and from the fear they were in, lest the Achæan league should declare against them.

The commissioners, however, were treated with sufficient deference. They were told that Thearidas should be sent to Rome; that they had only to repair to Tegea^a to treat there with the Lacedæmonians, and to incline them to peace. They went thither accordingly, and persuaded the Lacedæmonians to an accommodation with the Achæans, and to suspend all hostilities, till new commissioners should arrive from Rome, to pacify all differences. But Critolaus's cabal took their measures in such a manner, that nobody, except that magistrate, went to the congress; and he did not arrive there till he was almost no longer expected. Conferences were held with the Lacedæmonians; but Critolaus would not come into any measures. He said, that he was not empowered to decide any thing without the consent of the nation, and that he would report the affair in the general diet, which could not be summoned in less than six months. That bad stratagem, or rather breach of faith, exceedingly offended Julius. After having dismissed the Lacedemonians, he set out for Rome, where he described Critolaus as a violent and extravagant man.

^a A city on the banks of the Eurotas.

The commissioners were no sooner out of Peloponnesus than Critolaus ran from city to city, during the whole winter, and summoned assemblies, under colour of communicating what had been said to the Lacedemonians in the conferences held at Tegea, but, in fact, to vent invectives against the Romans, and to put an odious construction upon all they had done, in order to inspire the same spirit of animosity and aversion, which he himself had against them; and, he only succeeded too well. He, besides, prohibited all judges from prosecuting and imprisoning any Achean for debt, till the conclusion of the affair between the diet and Lacedemon. By that means, whatever he said had all the effect he desired, and disposed the multitude to receive such orders as he thought fit to give them. Incapable of forming right judgments of the future, they suffered themselves to be caught with the bait of the first advantage he proposed to them.

Metellus having received advice in Macedonia of the troubles in Peloponnesus, deputed thither four Romans of distinction, who arrived at Corinth at the time the council was assembled there. They spoke in it with abundance of moderation; exhorting the Acheans not to draw upon themselves, by imprudent rashness and levity, the resentment of the Romans. They were treated with contempt, and ignominiously turned out of the assembly. An innumerable crowd of workmen and artificers rose about them, and insulted them. All the cities of Achaia were at that time in a kind of delirium; but Corinth was far more frantic than the rest, and abandoned to a kind of madness. They had been persuaded, that Rome intended to enslave them all, and absolutely to destroy the Achean league.

Critolaus seeing with pleasure that every thing succeeded to his wishes, harangued the multitude, enflamed them against the magistrates who did not enter into his views; flew out against the ambassadors themselves, animated them against the Romans, and gave them to understand, that it was not without previous good measures he had undertaken to make head against the Romans; that he had kings in his party; and that the republics were also ready to join it. By these seditious discourses he prevailed to have war declared against the Lacedemonians, and, in consequence, indirectly against the Romans. The ambassadors then separated. One of them repaired to Lacedemon, to observe the motions of the enemy; another set out for Naupactus, and two waited the arrival of Metellus at Athens.

The magistrate of the Beotians, whose name was Pytheas, equally rash and violent with Critolaus, entered into his measures, and engaged the Beotians to join their arms with those of the Acheans; they were discontented with a sentence Rome had given against them. The city of Chalcis suffered itself also to be drawn into their party. The Acheans, with such feeble aids, believed themselves in a condition to support all the weight of the Roman power ; so much were they blinded by their rage and fury.

⁂ The Romans had chosen Mummius for one of the consuls, and charged him with the Achean war. Metellus, to deprive him of the glory of terminating this war, sent new ambassadors to the Acheans, with promises that the Roman people should forget all that had passed, and pardon their faults, if they would return to their duty, and consent that certain cities which had been proposed before, should be dismembered from the league. This proposal was rejected with disdain. Upon which Metellus advanced with his troops against the rebels. He came up with them near the city of Scarphea in Locris, and obtained a considerable victory over them, in which he took more than one thousand prisoners. Critolaus disappeared in the battle without its being known what became of him. It was supposed that in the flight he had fallen into the marshes, and been drowned. Dieus took upon him the command in his stead, gave liberty to the slaves, and armed all the Acheans and Arcadians capable of bearing arms. That body of troops amounted to fourteen thousand foot, and six hundred horse. He gave orders besides, for the raising of troops in every city. The exhausted cities were in the utmost desolation. Many private persons, reduced to despair, laid violent hands upon themselves ; others abandoned an unhappy country, where they foresaw their destruction was inevitable. Notwithstanding the extremity of these misfortunes, they had no thoughts of taking the only measures that could prevent them. They detested the rashness of their chiefs, and nevertheless came into their measures.

Metellus, after the battle before mentioned, fell in with one thousand Arcadians in Beotia, near Chero-nea, who were endeavouring to return into their own country; these were all put to the sword. From thence he marched with his victorious army to Thebes, which he found almost entirely deserted. Moved with the deplorable condition of that city, he ordered that the temples and houses should be spared; and that none of the inhabitants, either in the city or country, should be made prisoners, or put to death. He excepted from that number Pytheas, the author of all their miseries, who was brought to him and put to death. From Thebes, after having taken Megara, the garrison of which had retired upon his approach, he made his troops march to Corinth, where Dieus had shut himself up. He sent thither three of the principal persons of the league, who had taken refuge with him, to exhort the Achæans to return to their duty, and accept the conditions of peace offered them. Metellus ardently desired to terminate the affair before the arrival of Mummius. The inhabitants, on their side, were equally desirous of seeing a period of their misfortunes; but that was not in their power, the faction of Dieus, disposing of every thing. The deputies were thrown into prison, and would have been put to death, if Dieus had not seen the multitude extremely enraged at the punishment he had inflicted upon Solocrates, who had talked of surrendering to the Romans. The prisoners were therefore dismissed.

Things were in this condition when Mummius arrived. He had hastened his march, from the fear of finding every thing pacified at his arrival, and lest another should have the glory of concluding this war. Metellus resigned the command to him, and returned into Macedonia. When Mummius had assembled all his troops, he advanced to the city, and encamped before it. A body of his advanced guards being negligent of duty upon their post, the besieged made a sally, attacked them vigorously, killed many, and pursued the rest almost to the entrance of their camp. This small advantage very much encouraged the Achæans, and thereby proved fatal to them. Dius offered the consul battle. The latter, to augment his rashness, kept his troops within the camp, as if fear prevented him from accepting it. The joy and presumption of the Achæans rose to an inexpressible height. They advanced furiously with all their troops, having placed their wives and children upon the neighbouring eminences, to be spectators of the battle, and caused a great number of carriages to follow them, to be laden with the booty they should take from the enemy; so fully did they assure themselves of the victory.

Never was there a more rash or ill founded confidence. The faction had removed from the service and councils all such as were capable of commanding the troops, or conducting affairs, and had substituted others in their room, without either talents or ability; in order to their being more absolutely masters of the government, and ruling without opposition. The chiefs, without military knowledge, valor, or experience, had no other merit than a blind and frantic rage.

They had already committed an excess of folly in hazarding a battle, which was to decide their fate, without necessity, instead of thinking of a long and brave defence in so strong a place as Corinth, and of obtaining good conditions by a vigorous resistance. The battle was fought near Leucopetra,^w and the defile of the isthmus. The consul had posted part of his horse in an ambuscade, which they quitted at a proper time for charging the Achean cavalry in flank ; who, surprised by an unforeseen attack, gave way immediately. The infantry made a little more resistance ; but, as it was neither covered nor sustained by the horse, it was soon broke and put to flight. If Dieus had retired into the place, he might have held out some time, and obtained an honourable capitulation from Mummius, whose sole aim was to put an end to the war. But abandoning himself to despair, he rode full speed to Megalopolis, his country ; and having entered his house, set fire to it, killed his wife, to prevent her falling into the hands of the enemy, drank poison, and in that manner put an end to his life, worthy of the many crimes he had committed.

After this defeat, the inhabitants lost all hope of defending themselves. As they found they were without counsel, leaders, courage, or views, nobody had any thoughts of rallying the wrecks of the army, in order to make any further resistance, and oblige the victor to grant them some supportable conditions ; so that all the Achæans who had retired into Corinth, and most of the citizens, quitted it the following night, to save themselves where they could. The consul having entered the city, abandoned it to be plundered by the soldiers. All the men who were left in it were put to the sword, and the women and children sold; and, after the statues, paintings, and richest moveables were removed, in order to their being carried to Rome, the houses were set on fire, and the whole city continued universally in flames for several days. From that time the Corinthian brass became more famous than ever, though it had been in reputation long before. It is pretended that the gold, silver, and brass, which was melted, and ran together in this conflagration, formed a new and precious metal. The walls were afterwards demolished, and razed to their very foundations. All this was executed by order of the senate, to punish the insolence of the Corinthians, who had violated the law of nations, in their treatment of the ambassadors sent to them by Rome.

^w This place is not now known

Thus was Corinth ruined, the same year Carthage was taken and destroyed by the Romans, nine hundred and fifty two years after its foundation by Aletes, the son of Hippotes, sixth in descent from Hercules. It does not appear that they had any thoughts of raising new troops for the defence of the country, or summoned any assembly to deliberate upon the measures it was necessary to take; nor that any one took upon him to propose any remedy for the public calamities, or endeavoured to appease the Romans, by sending deputies to implore their clemency. One would have thought, from this general inactivity, that the Achean league had been entirely buried in the ruins of Corinth; so much had the dreadful destruction of that city alarmed, and universally dismayed the people.

The cities that had joined in the revolt of the Achæans were also punished by the demolition of their walls, and by being disarmed. The ten commissioners, sent by the senate to regulate the affairs of Greece, in conjunction with the consul, abolished popular government in all the cities, and established magistrates in them, who were to have a certain revenue out of the public funds. In other respects, they were left in possession of their laws and liberty. They abolished also all the general assemblies held by the Achæans, Beotians, Phœceans, and other people of Greece; but they were reestablished soon after. Greece, from that time, was reduced into a Roman province, called the province of Achaia; because, at the taking of Corinth, the Achæans were the most powerful people of Greece. The Roman people sent a pretor thither every year to govern it.

Rome, by destroying Corinth in this manner, thought proper to show that example of severity, in order to deter others, whom its too great clemency rendered bold, rash, and presuming, from the hope they had of obtaining the Roman people's pardon for their faults. Besides which, the advantageous situation of that city, where such as revolted might canton themselves, and make it a place of arms against the Romans, determined them to ruin it entirely. * Cicero, who did not disapprove of Carthage and Numantia being used in that manner, could have wished that Corinth had been spared.

* Majores nostri; Carthaginem et Numantiam funditus sustulerunt. Sed credo illos secutos opportunitatem loci maxime, ne posset aliquando ad bellum faciendum locus ipse adhortari. Cic. de Offic. l. i. n. 35.

The booty taken at Corinth was sold, and considerable sums raised from it. Amongst the paintings there was a piece drawn by the most celebrated ^y hand in Greece,^z representing Bacchus, the beauty of which was not known to the Romans, who were at that time entirely ignorant in the polite arts. Polybius, who was then in the country, as I shall soon observe, had the mortification to see that painting serve the soldiers for a table to play at dice upon. It was adjudged to Attalus, in the sale made of the booty, for six hundred thousand sesterces, that is, about three thousand six hundred and twenty five pounds, sterling. Pliny mentions another picture of the same painter's, which the same Attalus purchased for one hundred talents, or one hundred thousand crowns. That prince's riches were immense, and were become a proverb; Attalicis conditionibus. Nevertheless these sums seem repugnant to probability. However it were, the consul, surprised that the price of the painting in question should rise so high, interposed his authority, and retained it, contrary to public faith, and notwithstanding the complaints of Attalus; because he imagined there was some hidden virtue in the piece, unknown to him. ^a He did not act in that manner for his private interest, nor with the view of appropriating it to himself, as he sent it to Rome, to be applied in adorning the city. In doing which, says Cicero, he adorned and embellished his house much more essentially, than if he had placed that picture in it. The taking of the richest and most opulent city of Greece did not enrich him one farthing. Such noble disinterestedness was at that time common in Rome, and seemed less the virtue of private persons, than of the age itself. To take the advantage of office and command for enriching a man's self, was not only shameful and infamous, but a criminal abuse. The painting we speak of, was set up in the temple of Ceres, whither the judges went to see it out of curiosity, as a masterpiece of art; and it remained there till it was burned with that temple.

^y This painter was called Aristides. The picture mentioned here, was in such estimation, that it was commonly said, "All paintings are nothing in comparison to the Bacchus."

^z Strab. l. viii. p. 381. Plin. l. vii. c. 38, and l. xxxv. c. 4, and 10.

^a Numquid Lucius Mummius copiosior, cum copiosissimam urbem funditus sustulisset? Italiam ornare, quam domum suam, maluit. Quamquam Italia ornata, domus ipsa mihi videtur ornatio. Laus abstinentiæ non hominis est solum, sed etiam temporum. Habere quæstui remp. non modo turpe est, sed scelcratum etiam et nefarium. Cic. de Offic. l. i. n. 76, 77.

Mummius was a great warrior, and an excellent man, but had neither learning, knowledge of arts, nor taste for painting or sculpture, the merit of which he did not distinguish; not believing there was any difference between picture and picture, or statue and statue, nor that the name of the great masters in those arts gave them their value. This he fully explained upon the present occasion. ^b He had ordered persons to take care of transporting many of the paintings and statues of the most excellent masters to Rome. Never had loss been so irreparable, as that of such a deposit, consisting of the masterpieces of those rare artists, who contributed almost as much as the great captains, to the rendering of their age glorious to posterity. Mummius, however, in recommending the care of that precious collection to those to whom he confided them, threatened them very seriously, that if the statues, paintings, and other things, with which he charged them, should be either lost, or spoiled upon the way, he would oblige them to find others at their own cost and charges.

^b Mummius tam rudis fuit, ut capta Corintho, cum maximorum artificum perfectas manibus tabulas ac statuas in Italiam portendas locaret, juberet prædici conducentibus, si eas perdidissent, novas eas reddituras. Non tamen puto dubites, Vinici, quin magis pro republica fuerit, manere adhuc rudem Corinthiorum intellectum, quam in tantam ea intelligi; et quin hac prudentia illa imprudentia decori publico fuerit convenientior. Vell. Paterc. l. i. n. 13.

Were it not to be wished, says an historian, who has preserved us this fact, that this happy ignorance still subsisted; and would not such a grossness be infinitely preferable, in regard to the public good, to the exceeding delicacy of taste of the present age, for such sort of rarities? He spoke at a time when that taste for excellent paintings among the magistrates, was the occasion of their committing all manner of frauds and robberies in the provinces.

I have said that Polybius, on returning into Peloponnesus, had the affliction to see the destruction and burning of Corinth, and his country reduced into a province of the Roman empire. ° If any thing was capable of giving him consolation in so mournful a conjuncture, it was the opportunity of defending the memory of Philopemen, his master in the science of war. I have already observed, that a Roman, having taken it into his head to have the statues erected to that hero taken down, had the imprudence to prosecute him criminally as if he had been still alive, and to accuse him before Mummius, of having been an enemy to the Romans, and of having always opposed their designs to the utmost of his power. That accusation was extravagant, but had some colour in it, and was not entirely without foundation. Polybius boldly took upon him his defence. He represented Philopemen as the greatest captain Greece had produced in the latter times; that he might, perhaps, have carried his zeal for the liberty of his country a little too far; but, that he had rendered the Roman people considerable services upon several occasions; as in their wars against Antiochus and the Etolians. The commissioners before whom he pleaded so noble a cause, moved with his reasons, and still more with his gratitude for his master, decreed that the statues of Philopemen should continue as they were in all places. Polybius, taking the advantage of Mummius's good disposition, demanded also the statues of Aratus and Acheus; which were granted him, though they had already been carried out of Peloponnesus into Acarnania. The Acheans were so charmed with the zeal Polybius had expressed upon this occasion, for the honour of the great men of his country, that they erected a statue of marble to himself.

° Polyb. in Excerpt. p. 190—192.

He gave, at the same time, a proof of his disinterestedness, which did him as much honour amongst his citizens, as his defence of the memory of Philopemen. After the destruction of Corinth, it was thought proper to punish the authors of the insult done to the Roman ambassadors, and their estates and effects were sold by auction. When those of Dieus were put up, who had been the principal in that affront, the ten commissioners ordered the questor who sold them, to let Polybius take whatever he thought fit out of them, without taking any thing from him upon that account. He refused that offer, as advantageous as it appeared, and should have thought himself, in some measure, an accomplice of that wretch's crimes, had he accepted any part of his fortune ; beside which, he believed it infamous to enrich himself out of the spoils of his fellow citizens. He would not only accept nothing himself, but exhorted his friends not to desire any thing of what had appertained to Dieus ; and all that followed his example were extremely applauded.

^d This action made the commissioners conceive so high an esteem for Polybius, that upon their leaving Greece, they desired him to go to all the cities which had been lately conquered, and to accommodate their differences, till time had accustomed them to the change which had been made, and to the new laws prescribed them. Polybius discharged that honourable commission with so much goodness, justice, and prudence, that no further contests arose in Achaia, either in regard to the government in general, or the affairs of particulars. In gratitude for so great a benefit, statues were erected to him in different places ; upon the base of one of which was this inscription ; “ That Greece had been guilty of no errors, if she had hearkened from the first to the counsels of Polybius ; but, that after her faults, he alone had been her deliverer.”

Polybius, after having established order and tranquillity in his country, returned to join Scipio at Rome, from whence he accompanied him to Numantia, at the siege of which he was present. When Scipio was dead, he returned into Greece ; and, having enjoyed there ^e the esteem, gratitude, and affection of his beloved citizens, he died at the age of eighty two years, of a wound he received by a fall from his horse.

^d Polyb. in Excerpt. p. 190, &c.

Metellus, upon his return to Rome, was honoured with a triumph, as conqueror of Macedonia and Achaia and surnamed Macedonicus. The false king, Andriscus, was led before his chariot. Among the spoils, he caused what was called the troop of Alexander the Great, to be carried in the procession. That prince, at the battle of the Granicus, having lost twenty five of his friends, ordered Lysippus, the most excellent artist in that way, to make each of them an equestrian statue, to which he added his own. The statues were set up in dium, a city of Macedonia. Metellus caused them to be transported to Rome, and adorned his triumph with them.

Mummius obtained also the honour of a triumph, and, in consequence of having conquered Achaia, was surnamed Achaicus. He exhibited a great number of statues and paintings in his triumph, which were afterwards made the ornaments of the public buildings at Rome, and several other cities of Italy ; but, not one of them entered the conquerors own house.

SECTION V.

REFLECTIONS ON THE CAUSES OF THE GRANDEUR, DECLENSION, AND RUIN OF GREECE.

AFTER having seen the final ruin of Greece, which has supplied us through a series of so many ages with such fine examples of heroic virtues and memorable events, we may be admitted to return to the place from whence we began, and consider, by way of abridgment, and at one view, the rise, progress, and declension of the principle states that composed it. Their whole duration may be divided into four ages.

^e Lucian. in Macrob. p. 142.

The first and second Ages of Greece.

I shall not dwell upon the ancient origin of the Greeks, nor the fabulous times before the Trojan war, which make the first age, and may be called the infancy of Greece. The second age, which extends from the taking of Troy to the reign of Darius I. king of Persia, was, in a manner, its youth. In those early years it formed, fortified, and prepared itself for those great things it was afterwards to act, and laid the foundations of that power and glory, which at length rose so high, and became the admiration of all future ages.

The Greeks, as Monsieur Bossuet ^f observes, who had naturally abundance of wit, had been cultivated by kings and colonies which came from Egypt, who, settling in several parts of the country, spread universally the excellent polity of the Egyptians. It was from them they learned the exercises of the body, wrestling, the horse, foot and chariot races, and the other combats, which they carried to their highest perfection, an effect of the glorious crowns given to the victors in the Olympic games. But the best thing taught them by the Egyptians, was to be docile and obedient, and to suffer themselves to be formed by laws for the good of the public. They were not private persons, who, regarding nothing but their own interests and concerns, and have no sense of the calamities of the state, but as they suffer themselves, or as the repose of their own family is involved in them; the Greeks were taught to consider themselves and their families as part of a greater body, which was that of the state. The fathers brought up their children in this opinion; and the children were taught from their cradle, to look upon their country as their common mother, to whom they more strictly appertained than to their parents.

^f Universal History.

The Greeks, instituted thus by degrees, believed they were capable of governing for themselves, and most of the cities formed themselves into republics, under different forms of government, which had all of them liberty for their vital principle; but that liberty was wise, reasonable, and subservient to laws. The advantage of this government was, that the citizens loved their country the better from transacting their affairs in common, and from being all equally capable of its honours and dignities. Besides this, the condition of private persons to which all returned when they quitted employments, prevented them from abusing an authority, of which they might soon be deprived; whereas power often becomes haughty, unjust, and oppressive, when under no restraints, and when it is to have a long or continual duration.

The love of labour removed the vices and passions, which generally occasion the ruin of states. They led a laborious and busy life, intent upon the cultivation of lands, and of arts, and not excluding the husbandman or the artist from the first dignities of the state ; preserving between all the citizens and members of the state, a great equality, void of pomp, luxury, or ostentation. He who had commanded the army for one year, fought the next in the rank of a private officer, and was not ashamed of the most common functions in the armies either by land or sea.

The reigning character in all the cities of Greece, was a particular affection for poverty, the mean of fortune, simplicity in buildings, moveables, dress, equipage, domestics, and table. It is surprising to consider the small retributions with which they were satisfied for their application in public employments and services rendered the state.

What might not be expected from a people formed in this manner, educated and nurtured in these principles, and indued from their earliest infancy with maxims so proper to exalt the soul, and to inspire it with great and noble sentiments ? The effects exceeded all idea, and all hope that could possibly have been conceived of them.

The third age of Greece.

We now come to the glorious times of Greece, which have been, and will for ever be, the admiration of all ages. The merit and virtue of the Greeks, shut up within the obscure compass of their cities had but faintly dawned, and shone with but a feeble ray till this age. To produce and place them in their full light, some great and important occasion was necessary, wherein Greece, attacked by a formidable enemy, and exposed to extreme dangers, was compelled, in some measure, to quit her home, and to show herself abroad in open day; such as she was. And this was supplied by the Persians in their invasions of Greece, first under Darius, and afterwards under Xerxes. All Asia, armed with the whole force of the east, overflowed on a sudden, like an impetuous torrent, and came pouring with innumerable troops, both by sea and land, against a little spot of Greece, which seemed under the necessity of being entirely swallowed up, and overwhelmed at the first shock. Two small cities, however, Sparta and Athens, not only resist those formidable armies, but attack, defeat, pursue, and destroy the greatest part of them. Let the reader call to mind, which is all I have here in view, the prodigies of valor and fortitude, which shone at that time, and continued to do so long after, on like occasions. To what were the Greeks indebted for such astonishing successes, so much above all probability, unless to the principles I have mentioned, which were profoundly engraven in their hearts by education, example and practice, and were become by long habit a second nature in them?

Those principles, we cannot repeat it too often, were the love of poverty, contempt of riches, disregard of self interest, attention to the public good, desire of glory, love of their country; but above all, such a zeal for liberty, which no danger was capable of intimidating, and such an irreconcilable abhorrence for whoever conceived the least thought against it, as united their counsels, and put an end to all dissent and discord in a moment.

There was some difference between the republics as to authority and power, but none in regard to liberty ; on that side they were perfectly equal. The states of ancient Greece were exempt from that ambition which occasions so many wars in monarchies, and had no thoughts of aggrandizing themselves, or of making conquests at the expense of each other. They confined themselves to the cultivation, improvement, and defence of their lands, but did not endeavour to usurp any thing from their neighbours. The weaker cities, in the peaceable possession of their territory, did not apprehend invasion from the more powerful. This occasioned such a multitude of cities, republics, and states of Greece, which subsisted to the latest times in a perfect independence, retaining their own forms of government, with the laws, customs, and usages derived from their forefathers.

When we examine with some attention the conduct of these people, either at home or abroad, their assemblies, deliberations, and motives for the resolutions they take, we cannot sufficiently admire the wisdom of their government ; and we are tempted to demand of ourselves, from whence could arise this greatness of soul in the burghers of Sparta and Athens ; whence those noble sentiments, this consummate wisdom in politics, this profound and universal knowledge in the art of war, whether for the invention and construction of machines for the attack and defence of places, or for the drawing up and disposing all the motions of an army in battle ; add to this, that supreme ability in maritime affairs, which always rendered their fleets victorious, which so gloriously acquired them the empire of the sea, and obliged the Persians to renounce it for ever by a solemn treaty ?

We see here a remarkable difference between the Greeks and Romans. The latter, immediately after their conquests, suffered themselves to be corrupted by pride and luxury. After Antiochus had submitted to the Roman yoke, Asia, subdued by their victorious arms, conquered its conquerors by riches and voluptuousness ; and that change of manners was very sudden and rapid, especially after Carthage, the haughty rival of Rome, was destroyed. It was not so with the Greeks. Nothing was more exalted than the victories they had gained over the Persians ; nothing more soothing than the glory they had acquired by their great and illustrious exploits. After so glorious a period, the Greeks long persevered, in the same love of simplicity, frugality, and poverty ; the same remoteness from pomp and luxury ; the same zeal and ardour for the defence of their liberty, and the preservation of their ancient manners. It is well known how much the islands and provinces of Asia Minor, over which the Greeks so often triumphed, were abandoned to effeminate pleasures and luxury ; they, however, never suffered themselves to be infected by that contagious softness, and constantly preserved themselves from the vices of conquered people. It is true, they did not make those countries provinces, but their commerce and example alone might have proved very dangerous to them.

The introduction of gold and silver into Sparta, from whence they were banished under severe penalties, did not happen till about eighty years after the battle of Salamin ; and the ancient simplicity of manners subsisted very long afterwards, notwithstanding that violation of the laws of Lycurgus. As much may be said of the rest of Greece, which did not grow weak and degenerate, but slowly and by degrees. This is what it remains to show.

The fourth Age of Greece.

The principal cause of the weakening and declension of the Greeks, was the disunion which rose up amongst themselves. The Persians, who had found them invincible on the side of arms, as long as their union subsisted, applied their whole attention and policy in sowing the seeds of discord among them. For that reason they employed their gold and silver, which succeeded much better than their steel and arms had done before. The Greeks, attacked invisibly, in this manner, by bribes, secretly conveyed into the hands of those who had the greatest share in their governments, were divided by domestic jealousies, and turned their victorious arms against themselves, which had rendered them superior to their enemies.

Their decline of power from these causes gave Philip and Alexander opportunity to subject them. Those princes, to accustom them to servitude the more agreeably, coloured their design with avenging them upon their ancient enemies. The Greeks gave blindly into that gross snare, which gave the mortal blow to their liberty. Their avengers became more fatal to them than their enemies. The yoke imposed on them by the hands which had conquered the universe, could never be removed; those little states were on longer in a condition to shake it off. Greece, from time to time, animated by the remembrance of its ancient glory, roused from its lethargy, and made some attempts to reinstate itself in its ancient condition; but those efforts were ill concerted, and as ill sustained by its expiring liberty, and tended only to augment its slavery; because the protectors, whom it called in to its aid, soon made themselves its masters; so that all it did was to change its fetters, and to make them the heavier.

The Romans at length totally subjected it; but it was by degrees, and with abundance of artifice. As they continually pushed on their conquests from province to province, they perceived, that they should find a barrier to their ambitious projects in Macedonia, formidable by its neighbourhood, advantageous situation, reputation in arms, and very powerful in itself, and by its allies. The Romans artfully applied to the small states of Greece, from whom they had less to fear, and endeavoured to gain them by the attractive charms of liberty, which was their darling passion, and of which they knew how to awaken in them their ancient ideas. After having with great address made use of the Greeks to reduce and destroy the Macedonian power, they subjected all those states one after another, under various pretexts. Greece was thus swallowed up at last in the Roman empire, and became a province of it, under the name of Achaia.

ε It did not lose with its power that ardent passion for liberty, which was its peculiar character. The Romans, when they reduced it into a province, reserved to the people almost all their privileges; and ε Strab. l. ix.

Sylla,^b who punished them so cruelly, sixty years after, for having favoured the arms of Mithridates, did not abridge those of their liberty, who escaped his vengeance. In the civil wars of Italy, the Athenians were seen to espouse with warmth, the party of Pompey,ⁱ who fought for the republic. Julius Cesar revenged himself upon them no otherwise than by declaring, that he pardoned them out of consideration for their ancestors. But, after Cesar was killed, their inclination for liberty made them forget his clemency. They erected statues to Brutus and Cassius, near those of Harmodius and Aristogiton, the ancient deliverers of Athens, and did not take them down till solicited by Anthony, when become their friend, benefactor, and magistrate.

After having been deprived of their ancient power, they still retained another sovereignty, which the Romans could not take from them, and to which themselves were obliged to pay homage. Athens continued always the metropolis of the sciences, the school of polite arts, and the centre and standard of refined taste in all the productions of the mind. Several cities, as Byzantium, Cesarea, Alexandria, Ephesus, and Rhodes, shared that glory with Athens, and by its example opened schools, which became very famous. Rome, all haughty as she was, acknowledged this glorious empire. She sent her most illustrious citizens to be finished and refined in Greece. They were instructed there in all the parts of sound philosophy, the knowledge of mathematics, the science of natural things, the rules of manners and duties, the art of reasoning with justice and method ; all the treasures of eloquence were imbibed there, and the method taught of treating the greatest subjects with propriety, force, elegance and perspicuity.

^b Plut. in Sylla.

ⁱ Diod. l. xlii. p. 191. et l. xlviii. p. 339.

A Cicero, already the admiration of the bar, conceived he wanted something, and did not blush to become the disciple of the great masters Greece then produced. Pompey, in the midst of his glorious conquests, did not think it a dishonour to him, in passing Rhodes, to hear the celebrated philosophers, who taught there with great reputation, and to make himself, in some measure, their disciple.

Nothing shows better the respect retained for the ancient reputation of Greece than a letter of Pliny the younger.^k He writes in this manner to Maximus, appointed governor of that province by Trajan. “ Call to mind, dear Maximus, that you are going into Achaia, the true Greece, the same Greece where learning and the polite arts had their birth ; where even agriculture was invented, according to the common opinion. Remember that you are sent to govern free cities and free men, if any such there were ; who, by their virtues, actions, alliances, treaties and religion, have known how to preserve the liberty they received from nature. Revere the gods, their founders ; respect their heroes, the ancient glory of their nation, and the sacred antiquity of their cities, the dignity, great exploits, and even fables and vanity of that people. Remember it is from those sources that we have derived our law ; that we did not impose our laws upon them, after we had conquered them, but that they gave us theirs, at our request, before they were acquainted with the power of our arms. In a word, it is to Athens you are going; it is at Lacedemon you are to command. It would be inhuman and barbarous to deprive them of that faint image, that shadow which they retain of their ancient liberty.”

^k Lib. viii. c. 24.

Whilst the Roman empire was declining, that empire of genius, of the mind, always supported itself, without participating in the revolutions of the other. Greece was resorted to for education and improvement, from all parts of the world. In the fourth and fifth centuries, those great lights of the church, St. Basil, St. Gregory Nazianzen, St. Johannes Chrysostom, went to Athens to imbibe, as at their source, all the profane sciences. The emperors themselves,¹ who could not go to Greece, brought Greece in a manner home to them, by receiving the most celebrated philosophers into their palaces, in order to their being intrusted with the education of their children, and to improve themselves by their instructions. Marcus Aurelius, even whilst he was emperor, went to hear the philosophers Apollonius and Sextus, and to take lessons from them, as a common disciple.

By a new kind of victory unknown before, Greece had imposed its laws on Egypt and the whole east, from whence she had expelled barbarism; and introduced a taste for the arts and sciences in its room; obliging, by a kind of right of conquest, all those nations to receive her language and adopt her customs; a testimonial highly for the glory of a people, and which argues a much more illustrious superiority, than that not founded in merit, but solely upon the force of arms. Plutarch observes some where, that no Greek ever thought of learning Latin, and that a Roman who did not understand Greek was in no great estimation.

¹ Tit. Antonius, M. Aurelius, Lucius Verus, &c.

ARTICLE III.

IT seems, that after the subjection of Macedonia and Greece to the Romans, our history, confined for the future to two principal kingdoms, those of Egypt and Syria, should become more clear and intelligible than ever. I am, however, obliged to own, that it will be more obscure and perplexed than it has been hitherto, especially in regard to the kingdom of Syria, in which several kings not only succeed one another in a short space, but sometimes reign jointly, and at the same time, to the number of three or four, which occasions a confusion difficult to unravel, and from which I find it hard to extricate myself. This induces me to prefix in this place the names, succession and duration, of the reigns of the kings of Egypt and Syria. This small chronological abridgment may contribute to cast some light upon facts which are exceedingly complex, and serve as a clue to guide the reader in a kind of labyrinth, where the most clear sighted, will have occasion for assistance. It enlarges the work a little ; but it may be passed over, and recourse be only had to it when it is necessary to be set right ; I insert it here only with that view.

This third article contains the space of one hundred years for the kingdom of Egypt, from the twentieth year of Ptolemy Philometor, to the expulsion of Ptolemy Auletes from the throne, that is, from the year of the world 3845, to 3946.

As to the kingdom of Syria, the same article contains also almost the space of one hundred years from Antiochus Eupator, to Antiochus Asiaticus, under whom Syria became a province of the Roman empire; that is, from the year of the world 3840, to the year 3939.

SECTION I.

CHRONOLOGICAL ABRIDGMENT OF THE HISTORY

A. M.

KINGS OF EGYPT.

3824.

Ptolemy Philometor, reigned something more than thirty four years. This article contains only fourteen years of his reign.

Differences between Philometor and his brother Evergetes, or Physcon.

3859.

Ptolemy Evergetes, otherwise called Physcon, brother of Philometor, ascends the throne, and marries Cleopatra, Philometor's wife.

OF THE KINGS OF EGYPT AND SYRIA.

KINGS OF SYRIA.

| | A. M. |
|--|-------|
| Antiochus Eupator, aged nineteen years, succeeds his father Antiochus Epiphanes. He reigns only two years. | 3840 |
| Demetrius Soter, son of Seleucus Philopator, having escaped from Rome, ascends the throne. | 3842 |
| Bala, under the name of Alexander, giving himself out for the son of Antiochus Epiphanes, seizes the throne of Syria. He is supported by the Romans. | 3851 |
| Demetrius is killed in a battle. He had reigned twelve years. | |
| Alexander Bala. He reigns almost five years. Ptolemeus Philometor declares against him in favour of Demetrius Nicator, son of Demetrius Soter. | 3859 |
| DEMETRIUS NICATOR. | 3859 |
| Antiochus Theosson of Bala supported by Tryphon seizes part of the kingdom. | 3860 |
| Diodotes Tryphon, after having got rid of his pupil Antiochus, ascends the throne | 3861 |
| Demetrius marches against the Parthians, who take him prisoner, and confine him. He had reigned seven years. | 3865 |

3874 Physcon expels Cleopatra his wife, and marries her daughter, named also Cleopatra. He is reduced to fly. The Alexandrians restore the government to Cleopatra his first wife.

3877 Physcon reascends the throne.

3887 Death of Physcon. He had reigned twenty nine years.

KINGS OF SYRIA.

A. M.

Antiochus Sidetes,
brother of Demetrius,
after having overthrown Tryphon, and put him to death, is declared king. Cleopatra, Demetrius's wife, marries him.

3864

Antiochus Sidetes
marches against the Parthians.

3873

Demetrius Nicator reigns again in Syria.

The Parthians
send back Demetrius into Syria. Antiochus is slain.

38

Demetrius is killed by Zebina.

Alexander Zebina, supported by Physcon, expels Demetrius from the throne, who is killed soon after.

3877

Cleopatra wife of Demetrius, retains part of the kingdom after his death.

Seleucus V. eldest son of Demetrius, is declared king, and soon after killed by Cleopatra.

3880

Antiochus Grypus, his younger brother, is placed on the throne by Cleopatra.

3881

Zebina is overthrown by Grypus and dies soon after.

3882

Cleopatra designs to poison Grypus, and is poisoned herself.

3884

A. M.

KINGS OF EGYPT.

3887

Ptolemy Lathyrus, or Soter, succeeds Physcon.

Cleopatra, his mother, obliges him to repudiate Cleopatra his eldest sister, and marry Selena his youngest sister.

Cleopatra gives the kingdom of Cyprus to Alexander her youngest son.

3987

Cleopatra expels Lathyrus from Egypt ; he had reigned ten years. She sets his younger brother Alexander upon the throne.

3903

She gives her daughter Selena, whom she had taken from Lathyrus, in marriage to Antiochus Grypus.

KINGS OF SYRIA.

A. M.

Antiochus the 3890
Cyzicenean, son of Cleopatra and Anti-ochus Sidetes, takes arms against Grypus.

Cleopatra, whom 3891 Lathyrus had been obliged to repudiate, marries the Cyzicenean. She is killed by the order of Tryphena wife of Grypus.

The Cyzicenean 3892 gains a victory over Grypus, and drives him out of Syria.

Grypus is reconciled with his brother the Cyzicenean.

The two brothers 3893 are reconciled, and divide the empire of Syria.

Cleopatra gives 3903 her daughter Selena to Antiochus Grypus.

Death of Grypus. He had reigned twen- 3907
ty seven years.

Seleucus his son succeeds him.

Antiochus the 3910
Cyzicenean is overthrown, and put to death.

- 3915 Alexander kills his mother Cleopatra.
- 3916 Alexander is expelled himself; he had reigned nineteen years. He died soon after. Lathyrus is recalled.

KINGS OF SYRIA.

A. M.

Seleucus is overthrown, by Eusebes, and burnt in Mopsuestia.

Antiochus Eusebes, son of the Cyzicenean, causes himself to be declared king.

3911

Eusebes marries Selena widow of Grypus.

Antiochus XI. brother of Seleucus, and second son of Grypus, assumes the diadem, and is killed by Eusebes.

3912

Philip his brother, third son of Grypus, succeeds him.

3913

Demetrius, Eucharas, fourth son of Grypus, is established upon the throne at Damascus, by the assistance of Lathyrus.

3914

Eusebes overthrown by Philip and Demetrius, takes refuge amongst the Parthians.

3916

He is reestablished upon the throne by their means.

3918

Demetrius having been taken by the Parthians, Antiochus Dionysius fifth son of Grypus, is placed upon the throne of Damascus, and is killed the following year.

3923 Death of Lathyrus.

Alexander II. son of Alexander I. under Sylla's protection, is chosen king. He marries Cleopatra, called otherwise Berenice, and kills her seventeen days after. He reigned fifteen years.

The Alexandrians expel Alexander.

3939 Ptolemy Auletes, bastard son of Lathyrus is placed upon the throne.

KINGS OF SYRIA.

A. M.

3921

The Syrians, weary of so many divisions and revolutions, elect Tigranes King of Armenia. He reigns by a viceroy fourteen years.

Eusebes takes refuge in Cilicia, where he remains concealed.

3928

Selena his wife, retains part of Phenecia and Celosyria, and gives her two sons a good education.

Tigranes recalls Megadates his viceroy from Syria, who commanded there fourteen years in his name.

Syria being unprovided with troops, Antiochus, Asiaticus, son of Antiochus Eusebes, takes possession of some part of the country, and reigns there during four years.

13935

Pompey deprives Antiochus Asiaticus of his dominions, and reduces Syria into a province of the Roman empire. The house of the Seleucides is extinct with him.

3939

SECTION II.

ANTIOCHUS EUPATER SUCCEEDS TO THE KINGDOM OF SYRIA; JUDAS MACCABEUS'S CELEBRATED VICTORIES.

^a WE have long lost sight of the history of the kings of Syria, and that of the kings of Egypt, which have generally no small connection with each other. I am now going to resume the thread of them, which will not be interrupted any more.

^b Antiochus, surnamed Eupater, aged only nineteen, succeeded his father Antiochus Epiphanes, in the kingdom of Syria. The latter, at his death, sent for Philip his favourite, who had been brought up with him. He gave him the regency of the kingdom during his son's minority, and put his crown, signet, and all the other marks of the royal dignity, into his hands; recommending to him, above all things, to employ his whole care in educating his son in such a manner as was most proper to instruct him in the art of reigning.

Philip, on his arrival at Antioch, found that another had usurped the employment which the late king had confided to him. Lysias, upon the first advice of the death of Epiphanes, had placed his son Antiochus upon the throne, whose governor he was, and had taken upon himself, with the guardianship, the reins of the government, without any regard to the king's regulation at his death. Philip knew well that he was not at that time in a condition to dispute it with him, and retired into Egypt, in hopes of finding at that court the assistance he wanted, for the repossession of his right, and the expulsion of the usurper.

^a It is treated last towards the end of Book xviii. Article ii. Sect. ii. and iii.

^b A. M. 3840. Ant. J. C. 164. Appian. in Syr. p. 117. Maccab. iv. 17. 2 Maccab. ix. 29. et x. 10—13. Joseph. Antiq. l. xii. c. 14.

Much about the same time, Ptolemy Macron, governor of Celosyria and Palestine, from the enemy he had been till then to the Jews, became on a sudden their friend; moved, as the scripture says, with the crying injustice which had been committed in regard to them. He put a stop to the rigor of the persecution against them, and employed his whole credit to obtain a peace for them. By this conduct he gave his enemies occasion to hurt him. They prejudiced the king against him, by representing him perpetually as a traitor; because he had in reality betrayed the interests of his first master, Ptolemy Philometer, king of Egypt, who had intrusted him with the government of the island of Cyprus, and had given up that island to Antiochus Epiphanes, upon entering into his service; for, how advantageous soever the treason might be, the traitor, as is usual, was hated. At length, they did so much by their clamours and cabals that he was deprived of his government, which was given to Lysias; no other post or pension being conferred on him to support his dignity. He had not force of mind enough to bear his downfall, and poisoned himself; an end he had well deserved for his treason, and share in the cruel persecution of the Jews.

^c Judas Maccabeus at this time signalized his valor by several considerable victories over the enemies of the people of God, who continually made an implacable war against him. The little time that Antiochus Epiphanes survived the favourable inclinations he had expressed for the Jews, would not admit him to revoke in form his decree for obliging them to change their religion. The court of Syria, which always considered the Jews as rebels, desirous of throwing off its yoke, and had great interest in making so powerful a neighbouring people submit to it, had no regard to some transient demonstrations of the dying prince's favour to them. They always persisted in the same principles of policy, and continued to look upon that nation as an enemy, whose sole view was to shake off their chains, and to support themselves in liberty of conscience with regard to religion. Such were the dispositions of Syria in regard to the Jews.

^c 1 Maccab. v. 1—68. 2 Maccab. x. 14—38.

^d Demetrius, son of Seleucus Philopater, who, from the year his father died, had remained an hostage at Rome, was in his twenty third year, when he was informed of the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, and the accession of his son Eupater to the crown, which he pretended to be his right as the son of Epiphanes' eldest brother. He proposed to the senate his reestablishment upon his father's throne; and to engage them in it, he represented, that having been bred up at Rome, he should always regard it as his native country, the senators as his fathers, and their sons as his brothers. The senate had more regard for the interest of the republic than the rights of Demetrius, and thought it more advantageous for the Romans that there should be a king in his minority upon the throne of Syria, than a prince like Demetrius, who might at length become formidable to them. They therefore made a decree to confirm Eupater, and sent Cn. Octavius, Sp. Lucretius, and L. Aurelius, with the character of ambassadors, into Syria, to regulate all things conformably to the treaty made with Antiochus the Great. The same ambassadors had instructions to accommodate, if possible, the differences between the two kings of Egypt.

^d A. M. 3841. Ant. J. C. 163. Polyb. Leg. cvii. Justin. l. xxxiv. c. 3. Appian in Syr. p. 117.

^e Lysias terrified by the victories of Judas Maccabeus, formed an army of eighty thousand foot, and took with him all the cavalry of the kingdom, with eighty elephants; at the head of all these forces he marched into Judea, with the resolution to settle strange inhabitants, that worshipped idols, in Jerusalem. He opened the campaign with the siege of Bethsura, a fortress between Idumea and Jerusalem. Judas Maccabeus, and the whole people, beseeched the Lord, with tears in their eyes, to send his angel for the preservation of Israel. Full of confidence in God, they took the field. When they marched all together, with assured courage, out of Jerusalem, there appeared ^f a horseman marching before them. His habit was white, with arms of gold, and he held a lance in his hand. That sight filled them with new ardour. They threw themselves upon the enemy like lions, killed twelve thousand six hundred men, and obliged the rest to fly, most of them wounded and without arms.

^g After this check, Lysias, weary of so unsuccessful a war, and, as the scripture says, "Believing the Jews invincible, when supported by the aid of the Almighty God," made a treaty with Judas and the Jewish nation, which Antiochus ratified. One of the articles of this peace was, that the decree of Antiochus Epiphanes, which obliged the Jews to conform to the religion of the Greeks, should be revoked and cancelled, and that they should be at liberty to live in all places according to their own laws.

^e 2 Maccab. ix. 1—38. x. 1—7. xiii. 1—24. 1 Maccab. v. 65—68. iv. 19—63. Joseph. Antiq. c. xii.

^f It was an angel, perhaps St. Michael, protector of the people of God.

^g 2 Maccab. xi, 13.

This peace was of no long duration. The neighbouring people were too much the enemies of the Jews to leave them long in repose. Timotheus, one of the king's generals, assembled all his forces, and raised an army of one hundred and twenty thousand foot, without including the horse, which amounted to twenty five thousand. Judas, full of confidence in the God of armies, marched against him with troops very much inferior as to number. He attacked and defeated him. Timotheus lost thirty thousand men in this battle, and saved himself with great difficulty. This defeat was followed by many advantages on the side of Judas, which proved that God alone is the source of valor, intrepidity, and success in war. He showed this in the most sensible manner, by the evident and singular protection which he gave to a people, of whom he was in a peculiar manner the guide and director.

A new army was raised of one hundred thousand foot, with twenty thousand horse, thirty two elephants, and three hundred chariots of war. The king in person, and Lysias the regent of the kingdom, put themselves at the head of it, and entered Judea. Judas, relying upon the omnipotence of God, the Creator of the universe, and having exhorted his troops to fight to the last drop of their blood, marched and posted himself in front of the king's camp. After having given his troops for the word of battle, "The victory of God," he chose the bravest men of his army, and with them in the night attacked the king's quarters. They killed four thousand men, and retired, after having filled his whole camp with confusion and dismay.

Though the king knew from thence the extraordinary valor of the Jews, he did not doubt but they would be overpowered at length by the number of his troops and elephants. He resolved therefore to come to a general battle with them. Judas without being intimidated by the terrible preparations for it, advanced with his army, and gave the king battle, in which the Jews killed a great number of the enemy. Eleazer, a Jew, seeing an elephant larger than the rest, covered with the king's arms, and believing the king was upon it, sacrificed himself to preserve the people, and to acquire immortal fame. He forced his way boldly to the elephant, through the line of battle, killing and overthrowing all that opposed him. Then placing himself under the beast's belly, he pierced it in such a manner, that it fell and crushed him to death underneath it.

Judas, however, and his troops, fought with extraordinary resolution. But at length, exhausted by the fatigue, and no longer able to support the weight of the enemy, they chose to retire. The king followed them, and besieged the fortress of Bethsura. That place, after a long and vigorous defence, was obliged, for want of provisions, to surrender by capitulation.

From thence Antiochus marched against Jerusalem, and besieged the temple. Those who defended it were reduced to the same extremities with the garrison of Bethsura, and would, like them, have been obliged to surrender, if Providence had not relieved them by an unforeseen accident. I have observed, that Philip had retired into Egypt, in hopes of finding assistance there against Lysias. But the divisions which arose between the two brothers, who reigned jointly, as has been said elsewhere, soon undeceived him. Finding that he had nothing to expect from that quarter, he returned into the east, assembled some troops of Medes and Persians, and taking advantage of the king's absence, upon his expedition against Judea, he seized the capital of the empire. Upon that news, Lysias thought it necessary to make peace with the Jews, in order to turn his arms against his rival in Syria. The peace was accordingly concluded upon very advantageous and honourable conditions. Antiochus swore to observe it, and was admitted to enter the fortifications of the temple, with the sight of which he was so much terrified, that contrary to his faith given, and the oath he had sworn in regard to the peace, he caused them to be demolished before he set out for Syria. The sudden return of Antiochus drove Philip out of Antioch, and put an end to his short regency, and soon after to his life.

^h The troubles, occasioned by the divisions between the two Ptolemies, which we have just now mentioned, rose so high, that the Roman senate gave orders to the ambassadors they had sent into Syria, to proceed to Alexandria, and to use all their endeavours to reconcile them. Before they arrived there, Physcon, the youngest, surnamed Evergetes, had already expelled his brother Philometer. The latter embarked for Italy, and landed at Brunducium. From thence he went the rest of the way to Rome on foot, very ill dressed, and with few followers, and demanded of the senate the necessary aid for replacing him upon the throne.

^h A. M. 3842. Ant. J. C. 162. Porphy. in Cr. Eus. Scalig. p. 60 and 68. Diod. in Excerpt. Vales. p. 322. Valer Max. l. v. c. 1. Polyb. Leg. 193. Epit. Liv. l. 46.

As soon as Demetrius, son of Seleucus Philopater, king of Syria, who was still an hostage at Rome, was apprized of the unhappy condition to which that fugitive prince was reduced, he caused royal robes and an equipage to be got ready for him, that he might appear in Rome as a king, and went to meet him with all he had ordered to be prepared for his use. He found him twenty six miles, that is, at nine or ten leagues distance from Rome. Ptolemy expressed great gratitude to him for his goodness, and the honour he did him ; but did not think proper to accept his present, nor permit him to attend him the rest of his journey. He finished it on foot, and with the same attendants and habit he had worn till then. In that manner he entered Rome, and took up his lodging with a painter of Alexandria, who had but a very small house. His design, by all these circumstances, was to express the misery he was reduced to the better, and to move the compassion of the Romans.

When the senate were informed of his arrival, they sent to desire he would come to them ; and to excuse their not having prepared a house for his reception, and that he had not been paid the honours at his entry with which it was the custom to treat princes of his rank ; they assured him, that it was neither for want of consideration for his person, nor out of neglect, but because his coming had surprised them, and had been kept so secret, that they were not apprized of it till after he had entered Rome. Afterwards, having desired him to quit the habit he wore, and to demand an audience of the senate, in order to explain the occasion of his voyage, he was conducted by some of the senators to a house suitable to his birth ; and orders were given to the questors and treasurers, to see him served and supplied, at the expense of the public, with all things necessary during his residence at Rome.

When they gave him audience, and he had represented his condition to the Romans, they immediately resolved to reestablish him ; and deputed two of the senators, with the character of ambassadors, to go with him to Alexandria, and cause their decree to be put in execution. They reconducted him accordingly, and succeeded in negotiating an accommodation between the two brothers. Libya, and the province of Cyrene were given to Physcon ; Philometer had Egypt and the isle of Cyprus, and each of them was declared independent of the other in the dominions assigned them. The treaty and agreement were confirmed with the customary oaths and sacrifices.

But oaths and sacrifices had long been, with the generality of princes, no more than simple ceremonies, and mere forms, by which they did not think themselves bound in the least. And this way of thinking is but too common. Soon after, the youngest of the two kings, dissatisfied with the partition which had been made, went in person to complain of it to the senate. He demanded, that the treaty of partition should be annulled, and that he should be restored to the possession of the isle of Cyprus. He alleged, that he had been forced, by the necessity of the times, to comply with the former proposals, and that, though Cyprus should be granted him, his part would still be far from equal to his brother's. Menethyllus, whom the elder had deputed to Rome, made it appear that Physcon held not only Libya and Cyrenaica, but his life also, from the goodness of his brother ; that he had made himself so much the abhorrence of the people, by his violent proceedings, that they would have left him neither life nor government, had not his brother snatched him from their resentment, by making himself mediator ; that at the time he was preserved from this danger, he thought himself too happy in reigning over the region allotted to him ; and that both sides had ratified the treaty before the altar of the gods, and sworn to observe their agreement with each other. Quintius and Canuleius, who had negotiated the accommodation between the brothers, confirmed the truth of all Menethyllus advanced.

The senate, seeing that the partition was not actually equal, artfully took advantage of the quarrel between the two brothers, to diminish the strength of the kingdom of Egypt, by dividing it, and granted the younger what he demanded ; for such was then the policy of the Romans. Polybius makes this reflection. They made the quarrels and differences of princes the means of extending and strengthening their own power, and behaved in regard to them with so much address, that whilst they acted solely from their own interest, the contending parties were however obliged to them. As therefore the great power of Egypt gave them reason to apprehend, it would become too formidable if it fell into the hands of one sovereign who knew how to use it, they adjudged the isle of Cyprus to Physcon. Demetrius, who did not lose sight of the throne of Syria, and whose interest in that view it was, that so powerful a prince as the king of Egypt, should not continue in possession of the island of Cyprus, supported the demand of Physcon with his whole credit. The Romans made T. Torquatus, and Cn. Merula set out with the latter, to put him in possession of it.

ⁱ During that prince's stay in Rome, he had often the opportunity of seeing Cornelia, the mother of the Gracchi, and caused proposals of marriage to be made to her. But being the daughter of Scipio Africanus, and the widow of Tiberius Gracchus, who had been twice consul and censor, she rejected his offers, and believed it more honourable to be one of the first ladies of Rome, than queen of Libya with Physcon.

Physcon set out from Rome with the two Roman ambassadors. Their plan was to concert an interview between the two brothers upon the frontier, and to bring them into an accommodation by the method of treaty, according to the senate's instructions. Philometer did not explain himself openly at first. He spun out the affair to as great a length as he could, upon different pretexts, with design of making use of the time in taking secret measures against his brother.

ⁱ Plut. in Tib. Grac. p. 824.

At length he declared plainly, that he was resolved to stand to the first treaty, and that he would make no other.

^k The Cyreneans, in the mean time, informed of the ill conduct of Physcon, during his being possessed of the government at Alexandria, conceived so strong an aversion for him, that they resolved to keep him out of their country by force of arms. It was not doubted but Philometer had taken pains underhand to excite those troubles. Physcon, who had been overthrown by the rebels in a battle, having almost lost all hope, sent two deputies with the Roman ambassadors back to Rome, with orders to lay his complaints against his brother before the senate, and to solicit their protection. The senate, offended at Philometer's refusal to evacuate the island of Cyprus, according to their decree, declared the amity and alliance between him and the Romans void, and ordered his ambassadors to quit Rome in five days.

Physcon found means to reestablish himself in Cyrenaica, but made himself so generally hated by his subjects, through his ill conduct, that some of them fell upon him, wounded him in several places, and left him for dead upon the spot. He ascribed this to his brother Philometer; and when he was recovered of his wounds, undertook again a voyage to Rome. He there made his complaints against him to the senate, showed the scars of his wounds, and accused him of having employed the assassins from whom he received them. Though Philometer was the most humane of all princes, and could not be the least suspected of so black and barbarous an action, the senate, who were angry at his refusal to submit to the regulation they had made in regard to the isle of Cyprus, gave ear to this false accusation with too much facility. They carried their prejudice so high against him, that they would not so much as hear what his ambassadors had to say in his defence. Orders were sent them to quit Rome immediately. Besides which, the senate appointed five commissioners to conduct Physcon into Cyprus, and to put him in possession of that island, and wrote to all their allies near it to aid him for that purpose with all their troops.

^k A. M. 3843. Ant. J. C. 161. Polyb. Leg. c. xxxii. Id. in Excerpt Vales. p. 197. Diod. in Excerpt. Vales. p. 334.

¹ Physcon, by this means, with an army which seemed to him sufficient for the execution of his design, landed in the island. Philometer, who had gone thither in person, beat him, and obliged him to shut himself up in Lapitho, where he was soon invested, besieged, and at length taken, and put into the hands of a brother he had so cruelly injured. Philometer's exceeding goodness appeared upon this occasion. After all Physcon had done against him, it was expected, that having him in his power, he would make him sensible of his indignation and revenge. He pardoned him every thing; and, not contented to forgive him his faults, he even restored him Lybia and Cyrenaica, and added further some amends in lieu of the isle of Cyprus. That act of generosity put an end to the war between the two brothers. It was not renewed, and the Romans were ashamed of opposing any longer a prince of such extraordinary clemency. There is no reader who does not secretly pay the homage of esteem and admiration to so generous an action. Such inward sentiments which arise from nature, and prevent reflections, imply how great and noble it is to forget and pardon injuries, and what a meanness of soul there is in the resentment of the revengeful.

¹ A. M. 3847. Ant. J. C. 157.

SECTION III.

OCTAVIUS, THE ROMAN AMBASSADOR IN SYRIA, IS THERE KILLED.
DEATH OF JUDAS MACCABEUS.

^m WE have seen that the principal object of the commission of the three Roman ambassadors, Cn. Octavius, Sp. Lucretius, and L. Aurelius, who went first into Egypt, was to go into Syria, in order to regulate the affairs of that nation. When they arrived there, they found the king had more ships and elephants than had been stipulated by the treaty made with Antiochus the Great, after the battle of Sipylyus. They caused the ships to be burned, and the elephants to be killed, which exceeded the number stated in that treaty, and disposed all things else in such a manner as they thought most to the advantage of the Romans. This treatment seemed insupportable, and exasperated the people against them. A person, named Leptinus, was so incensed at it, that in his rage he fell upon Octavius ⁿ whilst he was bathing, and killed him.

^m A. M. 3842. Ant. J. C. 162. Appian. in Syr. p. 117. Polyb. Leg. cxiv, et cxxii. Cicer. Philip. ix. n. 4, 5. Justin. l. xxxiv. c. 3.

ⁿ This Octavius had been consul some years before, and was the first of his family who had attained that honour. Cic. Philip. ix. n. 4. Octavius, who became emperor, so well known under the name of Augustus, was of the same family with this Octavius, but of another branch, into which the consular dignity had never entered.

It was suspected that Lysias, the regent of the kingdom, had secretly a hand in this assassination. Ambassadors were immediately sent to Rome, to justify the king, and to protest that he had no share in that action. The senate sent them back without giving them any answer, to signify, by that silence, their indignation for the murder committed upon the person of Octavius, of which they reserved the examination and punishment to themselves. In the mean time, to do honour to his memory, they erected a statue to him among those of the great men who had lost their lives in defence of their country.

Demetrius believed, that the disgust of the Romans against Eupater was a favourable conjuncture, of which it was proper for him to take the advantage, and addressed himself a second time to the senate, to obtain their permission to return into Syria. He took this step contrary to the opinion of the greatest part of his friends, who advised him to make his escape without saying any thing. The event soon showed him how much they were in the right. As the senate had always the same motives of interest for keeping him at Rome as at first, he received the same answer, and had the mortification of a second denial. He had then recourse to the first advice of his friends; and Polybius, the historian, who was at Rome, was one of those who pressed him, with the utmost warmth, to put it in immediate execution, with secrecy. He took his advice. After concerting all his measures, he left Rome under pretence of a hunting match, went to Ostia, and embarked with a small train in a Carthaginian vessel, bound for Tyre, that waited for him.^o It was three days before it was known at Rome, that he had stolen away. All that the senate could do, was some days after to send Tib. Gracchus, L. Lentulus, and Servilius Glaucia, into Syria, to observe what effect the return of Demetrius would produce there.

^p Demetrius, having landed at Tripoli, in Syria, a report spread, that the senate had sent him to take possession of his dominions, and had resolved to support him in them. Eupater was immediately looked upon as a lost man, and all the world abandoned him to join Demetrius. Eupater and Lysias, seized by their own troops, were delivered up to the new comer, who ordered them to be put to death. Demetrius saw himself established by this means upon the throne, without opposition, and with prodigious rapidity.

One of the first actions of his reign was to deliver the Babylonians from the tyranny of Timarchus and Heraclides, who had been the two great favourites of Antiochus Epiphanes. He had made the first governor, and the second treasurer, of that province. Timarchus having added rebellion to his other crimes, Demetrius caused him to be put to death. He contented himself with banishing the other. The Babylonians were so much rejoiced to see themselves freed from the oppression of those two brothers, that from thenceforth they gave their deliverer the title of Soter, or Saviour, which he bore ever afterwards.

^o That ship carried to Tyre, according to custom, the first fruits of the lands and revenues of Carthage.

^p 1 Maccab. vii, viii, ix. et 2 Maccab. xiv. Joseph. Antiq. l. xii, xiii. Appian. in Syr. p. 11. Justin. l. xxxiv. c. 3.

Alcimus, whom Antiochus Eupater had made high priest of the Jews, after the death of Menelaus, not being qualified to be admitted by them in that capacity, because he had profaned the sanctity of the priesthood by following the impious custom of the Greeks under Antiochus Epiphanes ; this man gathered together all the apostate Jews who had taken refuge at Antioch, after having been expelled Judea, and putting himself at their head, came to petition the new king to defend them from the oppressions of Judas and his brothers, advancing a thousand calumnies against them. He accused them of having killed all persons that fell into their hands of Demetrius's party, and having forced him, with all those in his company, to abandon their country, and seek their security elsewhere. Demetrius immediately ordered Bacchis, governor of Mesopotamia, to march into Judea at the head of an army, and confirming Alcimus in his office, he joined him in commission with Bacchis, and charged them both with the care of this war. Judas rendered all the efforts of this first army ineffectual, as he did of a second commanded by Nicanor. The latter, enraged at the last defeat of the troops of Syria, and that an handful of men should make head against such numerous and warlike armies, and knowing that they placed their whole confidence with regard to victory in the protection of the God of Israel, and in the promises made in the temple where he was honoured, had uttered a thousand blasphemies against the Almighty, and against his temple. He was soon punished for them. Judas gave him a bloody battle ; and of his army of thirty five thousand men, not one escaped to carry the news of the defeat to Antioch. The body of Nicanor was found amongst the dead. His head and right hand, which he had lifted up against the temple, when he threatened to destroy it, were cut off, and placed upon one of the towers of Jerusalem.

Judas, after this complete victory, having some relaxation, sent an embassy to Rome. He saw himself continually attacked by the whole forces of Syria, without being able reasonably to rely upon any treaty of peace. He had no aid to expect from the neighbouring people, who, far from interesting themselves for the preservation of the Jewish nation, entertained no thoughts but of extirpating them in concert with the Syrians. He had been informed that the Romans, equally esteemed for their justice and valor, were always ready to support weak nations against the oppression of kings, whose power gave them umbrage. It was therefore, he thought it necessary to make an alliance with that people, in order to support himself by their protection against the unjust enterprises of the Syrians. Those ambassadors were very well received by the senate, who passed a decree, by which the Jews were declared the friends and allies of the Romans, and a defensive league was made with them. They even obtained a letter from the senate to Demetrius, by which he was enjoined not to distress the Jews any more, and war was threatened him, in case he persevered to do so. But before the ambassadors returned, Judas was dead.

As soon as Demetrius received news of the defeat and death of Nicanor, he gave the command of a powerful army to Bacchis and Alcimus, composed of the choicest of all his troops, and sent them into Judea. Judas had only three thousand men with him, when it arrived there. These were struck with such a panic, that they all abandoned him, except eight hundred men. Judas, with that small number, through an excess of valor and confidence, had the boldness to hazard a battle with so numerous an army, in which he perished, overpowered by multitude. His loss was deplored throughout all Judea and at Jerusalem, with all the marks of the most lively affliction, and the government put into the hands of Jonathan his brother.

Alcimus being dead, after having committed great violences against the true Israelites, and Bacchis being returned to Antioch, the country remained quiet, and was not harassed by the Syrians for two years. Demetrius had undoubtedly received the senate's letter in favour of the Jews, which obliged him to recal Bacchis.

¹ Demetrius indeed was at this time very cautious in his conduct with regard to the Romans, and used all his endeavours to induce them to acknowledge him king, and to renew the treaty made with the kings his predecessors. Having received advice, that the Romans had three ambassadors at the court of Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, he sent Menochares, one of his principal ministers, thither, to enter upon the negotiation. Finding at his return, by the report he made of what had passed, that the good offices of those ambassadors were absolutely necessary to his success, he sent again into Pamphylia, and afterwards to Rhodes, to assure them that he would conform entirely to their

will; and by the force of pressing solicitations, obtained at length by their means what he desired. The Romans acknowledged him king of Syria, and renewed the treaties made with that crown.

† To cultivate their amity, he sent the same Menochares the following year, in conjunction with some others, upon an embassy to Rome. They were charged with a crown that weighed ten thousand pieces of gold,[‡] as a present from him to the senate, in gratitude for their good treatment of him, during his being an hostage at Rome. They carried also with them Leptinus and Isocrates, in order to deliver them up, upon the account of the assassination of Octavius. This Leptinus was the person who killed him at Laodicea. Isocrates was a Greek, by profession a grammarian, who being in Syria at that time, had, upon all occasions, taken upon him to vindicate that equally base and unjust action. The senate received the ambassadors with all the usual honours, and accepted the present they brought; but would neither hear nor see two vile men, objects unworthy of their anger; reserving to themselves, without doubt, the right of exacting, when they pleased, a more distinguished satisfaction for the murder of their ambassador.

It was about this time that Demetrius, as I have observed before, established Holophernes upon the throne of Cappadocia. He was soon after expelled, and took refuge at Antioch. We are going to see how far he carried his ingratitude in regard to his benefactor.

† A. M. 3845. Ant. J. C. 159. Polyb. Leg. cxxii. Appian. in Syr. p. 118. Diod. Leg. xxv.

‡ They were worth more than ten thousand pistoles.

† Demetrius, who found himself without war or occupation, began to give into pleasure, and to lead an idle life, not a little singular and fantastic in the manner of it. He caused a castle to be built near Antioch, flanked with four good towers, and shut himself up in it, for the sake of abandoning himself entirely on the one side to indolence, not being willing to hear any more of affairs, and, on the other, to the pleasure of good cheer and excess of wine. He was drunk at least one half of the day. The memorials which people were desirous of presenting to him, were never received; justice was not administered; the affairs of the state languished; in a word, there was a general suspence of government, which soon stirred up the whole people against him. A conspiracy was formed for deposing him. Holophernes, who continued at Antioch, entered into this plot against his benefactor, flattering himself with obtaining the crown if the enterprise succeeded. It was discovered, and Holophernes put in prison. Demetrius would not deprive him of life. He chose rather to spare him, in order to make use of him upon occasion against Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, upon whose crown he had some pretensions.

Notwithstanding the discovery, the conspiracy was not suppressed. † The mal contents were supported underhand by Ptolemy Philometer, who had the affair of Cyprus at heart, and by Attalus and Ariarathes, who meditated revenging themselves for the war Demetrius had undertaken against them in favour of Holofernes. These three princes concerted together to employ Heraclides in preparing somebody to personate the son of Antiochus Epiphanes, and to set up hereditary pretensions to the crown of Syria. This Heraclides had been, as I have said already, one of the great favourites of Antiochus Epiphanes, and treasurer of the province of Babylon, at the same time Timarchus, his brother, another favourite, was governor of it. At Demetrius's coming to the crown, the two brothers having been convicted of malversation and other crimes, Timarchus had been executed, and the other having made his escape, had taken up his residence at Rhodes. It was there he took pains to form the man intended for the design I have mentioned. He chose for that purpose a young man, named Bala, of mean extraction, but very proper to act the part given him. He modelled him, and instructed him fully in all that it was necessary to say or do.

† A. M. 3850. Ant. J. C. 154. Joseph. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 3. Athen. l. x. p. 440. Justin. l. xxxv. c. 1.

‡ Polyb. Leg. cxxxviii. and cxi. Appian. in Syr. p. 131. Athen. l. v. p. 211. 1 Maccab. x. 1—50.

▼ When he was fully prepared, he began by causing him to be acknowledged by the three kings in the secret. He afterwards carried him to Rome, as he did also Laodice, the real daughter of Antiochus Epiphanes, for the better concealing of the imposture. By force of address and solicitations, he caused him to be acknowledged there also, and obtained a decree of the senate in his favour, which not only gave him permission to return into Syria, for the recovery of his dominions, but even granted him assistance for that purpose. Though the senate plainly saw through the imposture, and that all which was told of this pretender was mere fiction, they entered into every thing desired of them against Demetrius, with whom they were dissatisfied, and passed that decree in favour of the impostor. With this declaration of the Romans for him, he found no difficulty to raise troops. He then seized upon Ptolemais in Palestine, and there, under the name of Alexander, son of Antiochus Epiphanes, assumed the title of king of Syria. Many of the malcontents came thither to join him, and form his court.

This news made Demetrius quit his castle and his indolence, and apply himself to his defence. He assembled all the troops he could. Alexander armed also on his side. The assistance of Jonathan was of great consequence in this conjuncture, and both parties made their court to him. Demetrius wrote to him first, and sent him the commission of general of the king's troops in Judea, which rendered him at that time very much superior to all his enemies.

Alexander, seeing what Demetrius had done for Jonathan, was thereby induced to make proposals also to him, in order to bring him over to his side. He made him high priest, granted him the title of "Friend of the king," sent him a purple robe and a crown of gold, marks of the high dignity conferred upon him; for none at that time wore purple except princes and nobles of the first rank. Demetrius, who received advice of this, still outbid him to secure to himself an ally of such importance. But after the injuries he had done to all those who had the truest interest of the Jews at heart, and the whole nation in general, they dared not confide in him, and resolved to treat rather with Alexander. Jonathan therefore accepted the high priesthood from him, and with the consent of the whole people, at the feast of the tabernacles, which happened soon after, he put on the pontifical vestments, and officiated as high priest.

The place had been vacant seven years from the death of Alcimus. The high priesthood, which at that time came into the Asmonean family, continued in it till Herod's time, who, from hereditary, as it had been till then, made an employment of it which he disposed of at pleasure.

* The two kings having taken the field, Demetrius, who wanted neither valor nor good sense, when his reason was not impaired by wine, was victorious in the first battle; but it was of no advantage to him. Alexander soon received new troops from the three kings who had set him up, and continued to support him vigorously. Having, besides this, the Romans and Jonathan on his side, he retrieved himself, and maintained his ground. The Syrians continually deserted also, because they could not bear Demetrius. That prince, beginning to apprehend the event of the war, sent his two sons, Demetrius and Antiochus to Cnidos a city of Caria, in order to their security in case of misfortune. He confided them, with a considerable sum of money, to the care of a friend of his in that city; in order, if any accident should happen, that they might remain there in safety, and wait some favourable conjuncture.

* It was at the same time, and perhaps in imitation of Alexander Bala, that Andrisous played the same part in Macedonia. He had retired to Demetrius, who had given him up to the Romans, from the hope of conciliating their favour.

† The two competitors for the crown of Syria having assembled all their troops, proceeded to a decisive battle. At first Demetrius's left wing broke that of the enemy which opposed it, and put it to flight. But being too hot in the pursuit, a common fault in battles, and which almost always occasions their being lost, at their return they found the right, at the head of which Demetrius fought in person, routed, and the king himself killed in the pursuit. As long as he had been in a condition to support the enemy's charge, he had omitted nothing that valor and conduct were capable of, which might conduce to his success. At length his troops gave way, and in the retreat his horse plunged into a bog, where those who pursued him, killed him with their arrows. He had reigned twelve years. Alexander, by this victory, found himself master of the empire of Syria.

* As soon as Alexander saw himself at repose, he sent to demand Cleopatra, the daughter of Ptolemy, king of Egypt, in marriage. She was granted him, and her father conducted her in person to Ptolemais, where the nuptials were celebrated. Jonathan was invited to that feast, and went thither, where he was received by the two kings with all possible marks of honour.

* A. M. 3853. Ant. J. C. 151.

† A. M. 3854. Ant. J. C. 150. † 1 Maccab. x. 51—66.

Onias, son of Onias III. having been disappointed of the high priesthood, after the death of his uncle Menelaus, had retired into Egypt.^a He had found means to insinuate himself so well into the favour of Ptolemy Philometer and Cleopatra his wife, that he was become their favourite, and most intimate confidant. He made use of his credit at that court to obtain the king's permission for building a temple for the Jews in Egypt, like that in Jerusalem; assuring him that favour would bring the whole nation into his party against Antiochus Epiphanes. At the same time the high priesthood there was granted to him and his descendants for ever. The great difficulty was to make the Jews come into this innovation; it being forbid by the law to offer sacrifices in any place but the temple of Jerusalem. It was not without difficulty he overcame their repugnance, by a passage in Isaiah, wherein the prophet foretels this event in these terms;^b "In that day shall five cities in the land of Egypt speak the language of Canaan, and swear to the Lord of hosts; the one shall be called the city of destruction." (M. Rollin says, the city of the sun, or Heliopolis.) "In that day there shall be an altar to the Lord in the midst of the land of Egypt; and a pillar at the border thereof to the Lord. And it shall be for a sign and for a witness unto the Lord of hosts in the land of Egypt; for they shall cry unto the Lord because of the oppressors, and he shall send them a saviour and a great one, and he shall deliver them. And the Lord shall be known to Egypt, and the Egyptians shall know the Lord in that day, and shall do sacrifice and oblation, yea, they shall vow a vow unto the Lord, and perform it.”

^a Joseph. contra Appian. l. ii.

^b Isa. xix. 18—21.

The event here foretold by Isaiah, is one of the most singular, and, at the same time, the most remote from all probability. Nothing was more strictly forbidden to the Jews, than to offer sacrifices to God, in any other place than the temple built by his order at Jerusalem; how much more, in consequence, to build a temple elsewhere, especially in a land polluted with the most gross idolatry, and always at enmity with the people of God? This however came to pass, exactly as the prophet Isaiah had foretold. I shall not enter in a circumstantial exposition of this prophecy, which would carry me too far from my subject.

° Alexander Bala, finding himself in the peaceable possession of the crown of Syria, thought he had nothing more to do than to take all the pleasures the abundance and power to which he had attained would admit. He abandoned himself therefore to his natural inclination for luxury, idleness and debauch. He left the care of affairs entirely to a favourite, named Ammonius. That insolent and cruel minister put to death Laodice, the sister of Demetrius, and widow of Perseus, king of Macedonia; Antigonus, Demetrius's son, who had continued in Syria when the two others were sent to Cnidos; in fine, all the persons of the blood royal he could find, in order to secure to his master, by that means, the possession of the crown he had usurped by an imposture. That conduct soon drew upon both the abhorrence of the people.

° A. M. 3856. Ant J. C. 148. Liv. Epit. lib. 1. Justin. 1. xxv. c. 2.
Jos. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 8. 1 Maccab. x. 67—89. Diod. in Excerpt.

Demetrius the eldest of Demetrius's sons, was at Cnidos, and began to be of an age capable of counsel and action. When he was advised of this aversion of the people, he thought the occasion very favourable for repossessing himself of his right. Lasthenes, the friend in whose house he lived, procured him some companies of Cretans, with which he landed in Cilicia. There soon joined him a sufficient number of mal contents to form an army, with which he made himself master of the whole province. Alexander opened his eyes and quitted his seraglio to apply himself to his affairs. He left the government of Antioch to Hierax and Diodotus, who is also called Tryphon, put himself at the head of an army, formed of all the troops he could assemble, and upon receiving advice that Apollonius, governor of Celosyria and Phenicia, had declared for Demetrius, he sent to demand aid of Ptolemy his father in law.

Apollonius's first thoughts were to reduce Jonathan, who persisted in his attachment to Alexander; but his success did not answer his design, and in one day he lost above eight thousand men.

^d Ptolemy Philometer, to whom Alexander had applied in the extreme danger wherein he found himself, came at last to the assistance of his son in law, and entered Palestine with a great army. All the cities opened their gates to him, according to the orders they had received from Alexander to that effect. Jonathan came to join him at Joppa, and followed him to Ptolemais. Upon his arrival a conspiracy was discovered, formed by Ammonius, against the life of Philometer. As Alexander refused to deliver up that traitor, he concluded that he had entered into the conspiracy himself, and in consequence, took his daughter from him, gave her to Demetrius, and made a treaty with him, by which he engaged to aid him in reascending the throne of his father.

^d A. M. 3858. Ant. J. C. 146.

The people of Antioch, who mortally hated Ammonius, believed it time to show their resentment. Having discovered him disguised like a woman, they sacrificed him to their rage. Not content with that revenge, they declared against Alexander himself, and opened their gates to Ptolemy. They would even have set him upon the throne. But that prince, assuring them that he was contented with his own dominions, instead of accepting that offer, recommended to them Demetrius the lawful heir, who accordingly was placed upon the throne of his ancestors, and acknowledged by all the inhabitants.

^e Alexander, who was at that time in Cilicia, marched with the utmost diligence, and put all to fire and sword around Antioch. The two armies came to a battle. Alexander was beat, and fled with five hundred horse to Zabdiel an Arabian prince,^f with whom he had intrusted his children. Betrayed by the person in whom he had placed most confidence, his head was cut off, and sent to Ptolemy, who expressed great joy at the sight of it. That joy was of no long duration, for he died some few days after, of a wound he had received in the battle. Thus Alexander king of Syria, and Ptolemy Philometer king of Egypt, died at the same time; the first after a reign of five years, and the second after one of thirty five. Demetrius, who had attained the crown by this victory, assumed the surname of Nicator, that is to say, the conqueror. The succession of Egypt was attended with more difficulties.

^e A. M. 5859. Ant. J. C. 145.

^f He is called Emlacuel in the Maccabees.

SECTION IV.

PHYSCON ESPOUSES CLEOPATRA, AND ASCENDS THE THRONE OF EGYPT.

§ CLEOPATRA, queen of Egypt, after the death of her husband, who was at the same time her brother, endeavoured to place the crown upon the head of the son she had by him. As he was yet very young, others laboured to obtain it for Physcon, king of Cyrenaica, the late king's brother, and sent to desire him to come to Alexandria. Cleopatra, thereby reduced to the necessity of her defence, caused Onias and Dositheus, with an army of Jews, to come to her assistance. There was at that time a Roman ambassador in Alexandria, named Thermus, who by his mediation accommodated affairs. It was agreed, that Physcon should marry Cleopatra, and educate her son, who should be declared heir to the crown; and that Physcon should possess it during his life. He had no sooner married the queen, and taken possession of the crown, than, even the very day of the nuptials, he killed her son in her arms.

§ A. M. 3859. Ant. J. C. 145. Joseph. contra Appian. l. ii. Justin. l. xxxviii. c. 8. Val. Max. l. ix. c. 1.

I have already observed, that the surname of Physcon, given to this prince, was only a nickname. That which he took himself was Evergetes, which signifies the benefactor. The Alexandrians changed it into that of Cacoergetes, that is to say, on the contrary, "one who delights in doing harm ;" a surname to which he had the justest title.

^b In Syria affairs went on but little better. Demetrius, a young prince without experience, left every thing to Lasthenes, who had procured him the Cretans, by whose aid he had ascended the throne. He was a corrupt and rash man ; and behaved himself so ill, that he soon lost his master the hearts of those who were most necessary to his support.

The first wrong step which he took, was in regard to the soldiers, whom Ptolemy, upon his march, had put into the maritime places of Phenicia and Syria to reinforce the garrisons. If he had left those garrisons in them, they would have very much augmented his forces. Instead of gaining them, or at least of treating them well, upon some umbrage which he conceived, he sent orders to the troops of Syria, who were in the same garrisons, to cut the throats of all the Egyptian soldiers; which massacre was accordingly executed. The army of Egypt, which was still in Syria, and had placed him upon the throne, full of just horror for so barbarous a cruelty, abandoned him immediately, and returned home. After which he caused the strictest search to be made for all those who had been concerned against himself or his father in the last wars, and punished all that could be found with death. When he believed, after all these executions, that he had no longer any enemies to fear, he broke the greatest part of his troops, and kept only his Cretans and some other foreigners in his service. By that means he not only deprived himself of the old troops, who had served under his father, and, being well affected to him, would have maintained him upon the throne ; but he rendered them his greatest enemies, by depriving them of the sole means they had to subsist. He found this fully verified in the insurrections and revolutions which afterwards happened.

^b Diod. in Excerpt. Vales. p. 346. 1 Maccab. ix. 20—37. Joseph. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 8.

Jonathan however, seeing every thing quiet in Judea, formed the design of delivering the nation at length from the evils it suffered from the citadel, which the Grecian idolaters still held in Jerusalem. He invested it, and caused machines of war to be brought, in order to attack it in form. Demetrius, on the complaints made to him upon that occasion, went to Ptolemais, and commanded Jonathan to attend him there, to give an account of that affair. Jonathan gave orders for pushing the siege vigorously in his absence, and set out to meet him with some of the priests and principal persons of the nation. He carried with him a great quantity of magnificent presents, and appeased the king and his ministers so successfully, that he not only caused the accusations, which had been formed against him, to be rejected, but even obtained great honours and new marks of favour. The whole country under his government was discharged from all duties, customs, and tributes, for the sum of three hundred talents,ⁱ which he agreed to pay the king by way of equivalent.

^k The king being returned to Antioch, and continuing to give himself up immoderately to all kind of excesses, violence, and cruelty, the people's patience was entirely exhausted, and the whole nation disposed for a general revolt.

Diodotes, afterwards surnamed Tryphon, who had formerly served Alexander, and had shared the government of Antioch with Hierax, seeing the people in this disposition, found the occasion favourable for attempting an hardy enterprise, which was to set the crown upon his own head, by the favour of these disorders. He went into Arabia to Zabdiel, to whom the person and education of Antiochus, the son of Alexander Bala, had been intrusted. He laid a state of the affairs of Syria before him, informed him of the discontent of the people, and in particular of the soldiery, and strongly represented, that there could not be a more favourable opportunity for setting Antiochus upon the throne of his father. He demanded that the young prince should be put into his hands, in order to his being restored to his rights.

His view was to make use of the pretensions of Antiochus, till he had dethroned Demetrius, and afterwards to rid himself of the young prince, and assume the crown to himself, as he did. Zabdiel, whether he penetrated his real design, or did not entirely approve his scheme, did not give into it at first. Tryphon was obliged to continue a considerable time with him, to solicit and press him. At length, between the force of importunity and presents, he gained Zabdiel's consent, and obtained what he demanded.

ⁱ Three hundred thousand crowns.

^k Justin. l. xxxviii. c. 9. 1 Maccab. xi. 39—74. xii. 21—34. Joseph. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 9. Appian in Syr. p. 132. Epit. Liv. l. iii. Strab. l. xvii. p. 752. Diod. in Excerpt. Valcs. p. 346.

¹ Jonathan carried on the siege of the citadel of Jerusalem with vigor ; but seeing that he made no progress, he sent deputies to Demetrius, to desire that he would withdraw the garrison which he could not drive out by force. Demetrius, who found himself involved in great difficulties from the frequent tumults which happened at Antioch, where the people had conceived an invincible aversion for his person and government, granted Jonathan all he demanded, upon condition that he would send troops to chastise the mutineers. Jonathan sent him three thousand men immediately. As soon as the king had them, believing himself sufficiently strong to undertake every thing, he resolved to disarm the inhabitants of Antioch, and gave orders accordingly, that they should all deliver up their arms. Upon this they rose, to the number of one hundred and twenty thousand men, and invested the palace with design to kill the king. The Jews immediately flew to disengage him, dispersed the multitude with fire and sword, burned a great part of the city, and killed or destroyed very near a hundred thousand of the inhabitants. The rest, intimidated by so great a misfortune, demanded peace; which was granted them, and the tumult ceased. The Jews, after having taken this terrible revenge of the wrongs the people of Antioch had done to Judea and Jerusalem, principally during the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes, returned into their country, laden with honour and booty.

¹ A. M. 3860. Ant. J. C. 144.

Demetrius always continuing his cruelties, tyranny and oppression, put many more persons to death for the last sedition, confiscated the estates of others, and banished a great number. All his subjects conceived such an hatred and animosity against him, that there wanted nothing but an occasion for rising, and making him experience the most dreadful effects of their vengeance.

Notwithstanding the promises he had made to Jonathan, and the great obligations he had to him for the aid which had preserved him, he behaved no better in regard to him than he did to others. Believing he could do without him for the future, he did not observe the treaty he had made with him. Though the sum of three hundred talents had been paid, he did not desist from demanding all the usual imposts, customs, and tributes, with the same rigor as before, and with menaces to Jonathan of making war upon him if he failed.

Whilst things were in this unsteady condition, Tryphon carried Antiochus, the son of Alexander, into Syria, and caused his pretensions to the crown to be declared by a manifesto. The soldiers who had been broke by Demetrius, and a great number of other mal contents, came in crowds to join the pretender, and proclaimed him king. They marched under his ensigns against Demetrius, beat him, and obliged him to retire to Seleucia. They took all his elephants, made themselves masters of Antioch, placed Antiochus upon the throne of the kings of Syria, and gave him the surname of Theos, which signifies the god.

Jonathan, discontented at the ingratitude of Demetrius, accepted the invitation made him by the new king, and engaged in his party. Great favours were heaped upon him, and Simon his brother. A commission was sent them, whereby they were empowered to raise troops for Antiochus throughout all Celosyria and Palestine. Of the troops they formed two bodies, with which they acted separately, and obtained several victories over the enemy.

^m Tryphon, seeing all things brought to the desired point for executing the project he had formed of destroying Antiochus, and of possessing himself of the crown of Syria, found no other obstacle to his design, than on the part of Jonathan, whose probity he knew too well even to sound him upon entering into his views. He resolved therefore to rid himself, at whatever price it cost him, of so formidable an enemy, and entered Judea with an army, in order to take him and put him to death. Jonathan came also to Bethsan at the head of forty thousand men. Tryphon perceived that he should get nothing by force against so powerful an army. He endeavoured therefore to amuse him with fine words, and the warmest assurances of a sincere friendship. He gave him to understand, that he was come thither only to consult him upon their common interests, and to put Ptolemais into his hands, which he was resolved to make him a present of as a free gift. He deceived him so well by these protestations of friendship, and obliging offers, that he dismissed all his troops, except three thousand men, of which he kept only one thousand about his person. He sent the rest towards Galilee, and followed Tryphon to Ptolemais, relying upon that traitor's oath, that he should be put into possession of it. He had no sooner entered the place, than the gates were shut upon him. Jonathan was immediately seized, and all his followers put to the sword. Troops were also detached directly to follow and surprise the two thousand men who were upon their march to Galilee. They had already received advice of what had happened to Jonathan and his troops at the city of Ptolemais, and having exhorted one another to defend themselves well, and to sell their lives as dear as possible, the enemy were afraid to attack them. They were suffered to proceed, and arrived all safe at Jerusalem.

^m 1 Maccab. xii. 39—54. xiii. 1—30. Joseph. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 10, 11. Justin. l. xxxvi. c. 1. Epit. Liv. l. lv.

The affliction there for what had befallen Jonathan was extreme. The Jews however did not lose courage. They chose Simon by universal consent for their general, and immediately, by his orders, set themselves at work with all possible speed to complete the fortifications begun by Jonathan at Jerusalem; and when advice came that Tryphon approached, Simon marched against him at the head of a fine army.

Tryphon did not dare to give him battle, but had again recourse to the same artifices which had succeeded so well with Jonathan. He sent to tell Simon, that he had only laid Jonathan under an arrest, because he owed the king one hundred talents; * that if he would send him that sum, and Jonathan's two sons as hostages for their father's fidelity, he would cause him to be set at liberty. Though Simon saw clearly that this proposal was no more than a feint ; however, that he might not have reason to reproach himself with being the occasion of his brother's death, by refusing to comply with it, he sent him the money, and Jonathan's two children. The traitor, notwithstanding, did not release his prisoner, but returned a second time into Judea, at the head of a greater army than before, with design to put all things to fire and sword. Simon kept so close to him in all his marches and counter-marches, that he frustrated his designs and obliged him to retire.

* One hundred thousand crowns.

◦ Tryphon, on his return into winter quarters in the country of Galaad, caused Jonathan to be put to death ; and believing after that he had nobody to fear, gave orders to kill Antiochus secretly. He then caused it to be given out, that he was dead of the stone, and at the same time declared himself king of Syria in his stead, and took possession of the crown. When Simon was informed of his brother's death, he sent to fetch his bones, interred them in the sepulchre of his forefathers at Modin, and erected a magnificent monument to his memory.

Tryphon passionately desired to be acknowledged by the Romans. His usurpation was so unsteady without this, that he perceived plainly it was absolutely necessary to his support. He sent them a magnificent embassy, with a golden statue of victory, of ten thousand pieces of gold in weight. He was cheated by the Romans. They accepted the statue, and caused the name of Antiochus, whom he had assassinated, to be inserted upon the inscription, as if it had come from him.

^p The ambassadors sent by Simon to Rome were received there much more honourably, and all the treaties made with his predecessors renewed with him.

Demetrius in the mean time amused himself with diversions at Laodicea,¹ and abandoned himself to the most infamous debauches, without becoming more wise from adversity, and without so much as seeming to have the least sense of his misfortunes. As Tryphon had given the Jews just reason to oppose him and his party, Simon sent a crown of gold to Demetrius, and ambassadors to treat with him. They obtained from that prince a confirmation of the high priesthood and sovereignty to Simon, exemption from all kind of tributes and imposts, with a general amnesty of all past acts of hostility, upon condition that the Jews should join him against Tryphon.

^r Demetrius at length recovered a little from his lethargy upon the arrival of deputies from the east, who came to invite him thither. The Parthians having almost overrun the whole east, and subjected all the countries of Asia between the Indus and the Euphrates, the inhabitants of those countries, who were descended from the Macedonians, not being able to suffer that usurpation, and the haughty insolence of their new masters, extremely solicited Demetrius, by repeated embassies, to come and put himself at their head ; assured him of a general insurrection against the Parthians ; and [promised to supply him with a sufficient number of troops to expel those usurpers, and recover all the provinces of the east. Full of these hopes, he at length undertook that expedition, and passed the Euphrates, leaving Tryphon in possession of the greatest part of Syria. He conceived, that having once made himself master of the east, with that increase of power he should be in a better condition to reduce that rebel at his return.

^p 1 Maccab. xiv. 16—40.

¹ A. M. 3863. Ant. J. C. 141. Diod. in Excerpt. Vales. p. 353. 1 Maccab. xiii. 34—42, and xiv. 38—41. Joseph. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 11.

² Justin. l. xxxvi. c. 1. l. xxxviii. c. 9, l. xli. c. 5, and 6. 1 Maccab. xv. 1—49. Joseph. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 9—12. Orosius, l. v. c. 4. Diod. in Excerpt. Vales. p. 359. Appian. in Syr. p. 132.

As soon as he appeared in the east, the Elymeans, Persians, and Bactrians, declared in his favour, and with their aid he defeated the Parthians in several engagements ; but at length under pretence of treating with him, they got him into an ambuscade, where he was made prisoner, and his whole army cut in pieces. By this blow, the empire of the Parthians took such firm footing, that it supported itself for many ages afterwards, and became the terror of all its neighbours, and even equal to the Romans themselves as to power in the field, and reputation for military exploits.

The king who then reigned over the Parthians, was Mithridates, son of Priapatius, a valient and wise prince. We have seen in what manner Arsaces founded, and his son Arsaces II. established and fixed this empire, by a treaty of peace with Antiochus the Great. Priapatius was the son of the second Arsaces, and succeeded him ; he was called also Arsaces, which became the common name of all the princes of this race. After having reigned fifteen years, he left the crown at his death to his eldest son Phraates, and he to Mithridates his brother, in preference ^s to his own children, because he had discovered more merit and capacity in him for the government of the people ; convinced, that a king, when it is in his own power, ought to be more attentive to the good of the state, than the advancement of his own family ; and to forget, in some measure, that he is a father, † to remember solely that he is a king. This Mithridates was that king of the Parthians into whose hands Demetrius had fallen.

That prince, after having subdued the Medes, Elymeans, Persians, and Bactrians, extended his conquests even into India, beyond the bounds of Alexander's ; and when he had defeated Demetrius, subjected also Babylonia and Mesopotamia, so that his empire was bounded at that time by the Euphrates on the west, and the Ganges on the east.

He carried Demetrius his prisoner in to all the provinces that still adhered to the king of Syria, with the view of inducing them to submit to him, by showing them the person they had looked upon as their deliverer, reduced to so low and shameful a condition. After that, he treated him as a king, sent him into Hyrcania, which was assigned him, for his place of residence, and gave him his daughter Rhodoguna in marriage. However, he was always regarded as a prisoner of war, though in other respects he had all the liberty that could be granted him in that condition.

^s Non multo post decessit, multis filiis relictis ; quibus præteritis, fratri potissimum Mithridati, insignis virtutis viro, reliquit imperium ; plus regio quam patrio deberi nomini ratus, potiusque patriæ quam libertis consulendum. Justin.

His son Phraates, who succeeded him, treated him in the same manner.

It is observed particularly of this Mithridates, that having subjected several different nations, he took from each of them whatever was best in their laws and customs, out of which he composed an excellent body of laws and maxims of state, for the government of his empire. This was making a glorious use of his victories; by so much the more laudable, as it is uncommon and almost unheard of, for a victor to be more intent upon improving from the wise customs of the conquered nations, than upon enriching himself out of their spoils. It was by this means that Mithridates established the empire of the Parthians upon solid foundations, gave it a firm consistency, effectually attached the conquered provinces to it, and united them into one monarchy, which subsisted many ages without change or revolution, notwithstanding the diversity of nations of which it was composed. He may be looked upon as the Numa of the Parthians, who taught that warlike nation to temper a savage valor with discipline, and to blend the wise authority of laws with the blind force of arms.

At this time happened a considerable change in the affairs of the Jewish nation. They had contended long with incredible efforts against the kings of Syria, not only for the defence of their liberty, but the preservation of their religion. They thought it incumbent on them to take the favourable advantage of the king of Syria's captivity, and of the civil wars with which that empire was continually torn, to secure the one and the other. In a general assembly of the priests, the elders, and the whole people at Jerusalem, Simon was chosen general, to whose family they had most essential obligations, and gave him the government with the title of sovereign, as well as that of high priest; they declared this double power, civil and sacerdotal, hereditary in his family. These two titles had been conferred on him by Demetrius, but limited to his person. After his death both dignities descended jointly to his posterity, and continued united for many generations.

* When queen Cleopatra saw her husband taken and kept prisoner by the Parthians, she shut herself up with her children in Seleucia, where many of Tryphon's soldiers came over to her party. That man, who was naturally brutal and cruel, had industriously concealed those defects under appearances of lenity and goodness, as long as he believed it necessary to please the people for the success of his ambitious designs. When he saw himself in possession of the crown, he quitted an assumed character that laid him under too much constraint, and gave himself up entirely to his bad inclinations. Many therefore abandoned him, and came over in no inconsiderable numbers to Cleopatra. These desertions did not however sufficiently augment her party, to put her into a condition to support herself. She was also afraid, lest the people of Seleucia should choose rather to give her up to Tryphon, than support a siege out of affection for her person. She therefore sent proposals to Antiochus Sidetes, Demetrius's brother, for uniting their forces, and promised, on that condition, to marry him, and procure him the crown. For when she was informed that Demetrius had married Rhodoguna, she was so much enraged that she observed no measures any further, and resolved to seek her support in a new marriage. Her children were yet too young to support the weight of a precarious crown, and she was not of a character to pay much regard to their right. As Antiochus therefore was the next heir to the crown after them, she fixed upon him, and took him for her husband.

This Antiochus was the second son of Demetrius Soter, and had been sent to Cnidos with his brother Demetrius, during the war between their father and Alexander Bala, to secure them against the revolutions he apprehended, and which actually happened, as has been said before. Having accepted Cleopatra's offers, he assumed the title of king of Syria.

^u He wrote a letter to Simon, wherein he complained of Tryphon's unjust usurpation, of whom he promised a speedy vengeance. To engage him in his interests, he made him great concessions, and gave him hopes of much greater, when he should ascend the throne.

^v Accordingly, the beginning of the following year, he made a descent into Syria with an army of foreign troops, which he had taken into his pay in Greece, Asia Minor, and the islands; and after having espoused Cleopatra, and joined what troops she had with his own, he took the field and marched against Tryphon. The greatest part of that usurper's troops, weary of his tyranny, abandoned him, and came over to the army of Antiochus, which amounted at that time to one hundred and twenty thousand foot, and eight thousand horse.

^u 1 Maccab. xv. 1—41. xvi. 1—10. Joseph. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 12, and 13.

^v A. M. 3865. Ant. J. C. 139.

Tryphon could not make head against him, and retired to Dora, a city in the neighbourhood of Ptolemais in Phenicia. Antiochus besieged him there by sea and land, with all his forces. The place could not hold out long against so powerful an army. Tryphon escaped by sea to Orthosia, another maritime city of Phenicia, and from thence proceeding to Apamea, where he was born, he was there taken and put to death. Antiochus thus terminated the usurpation, and ascended his father's throne, which he possessed nine years. His passion for hunting occasioned his being called Sidetes, or the hunter, from the word zidah, which has the same signification in the Syriac language.

Simon, established in the government of Judea, by the general consent of the nation, thought it necessary to send ambassadors to Rome, in order to his being acknowledged under that title, and to renew the ancient treaties. They were very well received, and obtained all they desired. The senate, in consequence, caused the consul Piso, to write to Ptolemy king of Egypt, Attalus king of Pergamus, Ariarathes king of Cappadocia,^w Demetrius king of Syria, Mithridates king of the Parthians, and to all the states of Greece, Asia Minor, and the islands with whom the Romans were in alliance, to notify to them, that the Jews were their friends and allies, and in consequence they should not undertake any thing to their prejudice.

^w This letter was addressed to Demetrius, though prisoner among the Parthians, because the Romans had neither acknowledged Antiochus Sidetes, nor Tryphon.

As Antiochus had only granted Simon so advantageous an alliance from the necessity of his present circumstances, and contrary to the interest of the state, as well as to the policy of his predecessors, the letter from the Romans did not prevent him from declaring against Simon, notwithstanding all the magnificent promises he had made him, and from sending troops into Judea under the command of Cendebeus, who was overthrown in a battle by Judas and John, the sons of Simon.

* Physcon had reigned seven years in Egypt. History relates nothing of him, during all that time, but monstrous vices and detestable cruelties. Never was there a prince so abandoned to debauch, and at the same time so cruel and bloody. All the rest of his conduct was as contemptible as his vices were enormous ; for he both said and acted in public the extravagances of an infant, by which he drew upon himself both the contempt and abhorrence of his subjects. Without Hierax, his first minister, he had infallibly been dethroned. This Hierax was a native of Antioch, and was the same to whom, in the reign of Alexander Bala, the government of that city had been given, in conjunction with Diodotus, afterwards surnamed Tryphon. After the revolution which happened in Syria, he retired into Egypt, entered into the service of Ptolemy Physcon, and soon became his captain general, and prime minister. As he was valiant in the field, and able in council, by causing the troops to be well paid, and amending the faults which his master committed, by a wise and equitable government, and by preventing or redressing them as much as possible, he had been till then so fortunate as to support the tranquillity of the state.

* A. M. 3866. Ant. J. C. 138. Justin. l. xxxviii. c. 8. Diod. in Excerpt. Vales. p. 361. Athen. l. iv. p. 184, and l. vi. p. 252. Val. Max. l. ix. c. 1, 2.

‡ But in the following years, whether Hierax was dead, or the prudence and ability of that first minister were no longer capable of restraining the folly of this prince, the affairs of Egypt went on worse than ever. Physcon, without any reason, caused the greatest part of those to be put to death, who had expressed the most zeal in procuring him the crown after his brother's death, and maintaining it upon his head. Athenus places Hierax in this number; but without mentioning the time. He also put to death, or at least banished, most of those who had been in favour with Philometer his brother, or had only held employments during his reign; and by permitting his foreign troops to plunder and murder at discretion, he terrified Alexandria so much, that the greatest part of the inhabitants, to avoid his cruelty, thought it necessary to retire into foreign countries, and the city remained almost a desert. To supply their places, when he perceived that nothing remained but empty houses, he caused proclamation to be made in all the neighbouring countries, that whosoever would come and settle there, of whatsoever nation they were, should meet with the greatest encouragements and advantages. There were considerable numbers whom this proposal suited very well. The houses that had been abandoned were given to them, and all the rights, privileges and immunities granted them, which had been enjoyed by the ancient inhabitants. By this means the city was re-peopled.

As amongst those who had quitted Alexandria, there was a great number of grammarians, philosophers, geometricians, physicians, musicians, and other masters in the liberal sciences, it happened from thence, that the polite arts and sciences began to revive in Greece, Asia Minor, and the islands ; in a word, in every place to which these illustrious fugitives carried them. The continual wars between the successors of Alexander had almost extinguished the sciences in all those countries, and they would have been entirely lost in those times of confusion, if they had not found protection under the Ptolemies at Alexandria. The first of those princes, by founding his museum for the entertainment of the learned, and erecting his fine library, had drawn about him almost all the learned men of Greece. The second and third following the founder's steps in that respect, Alexandria, became the city of the world, where the liberal arts and sciences were most cultivated, whilst they were almost absolutely neglected every where else. Most of the inhabitants of that great city studied or professed some or other of those polite arts, in which they had been instructed in their youth. So that, when the cruelty and oppression of the tyrant of whom I speak, obliged them to take refuge in foreign countries, their most general recourse for subsistence was to make it their business to teach what they knew. They opened schools in those countries for that purpose, and as they were pressed by necessity, they taught at a low price, which very much increased the number of their disciples. By this means the arts and sciences began to revive wherever they were dispersed ; that is to say, throughout what we call the whole east, exactly in the same manner as they took new birth in the west, after the taking of Constantinople by the Turks.

Much about the time that strangers came in crowds to ² repeople Alexandria, P. Scipio Africanus the younger, Sp. Mummius, and L. Metellus, arrived there as ambassadors from Rome. It was a maxim with the Romans to send frequent embassies to their allies, in order to take cognizance of their affairs, and to accommodate their differences. It was with this view, that three of the greatest persons in the state were sent at this time into Egypt. They had orders to go into Egypt, Syria, Asia, and Greece ; and to see in what condition the affairs of those countries were ; to examine in what manner the treaties made with them were observed ; and to remedy whatever they should find amiss. They discharged themselves of this commission with so much equity, justice, and address, and rendered such great services to those to whom they were sent, in restoring order amongst them, and in accommodating their differences, that as soon as they returned to Rome, ambassadors came from all parts where they had passed, to return the senate thanks for having sent persons of such extraordinary merit amongst them, and whose wisdom and goodness they could never sufficiently admire.

² Cic. in Somn. Scip. Athen. l. vi. p. 273. and l. xii. p. 549. Val. Max. l. iv. c. 3. Diod. Leg. xxxii.

The first place they went to, according to their instructions, was Alexandria. The king received them there with great magnificence. As to themselves, they affected state so little, that, at their entry, Scipio, who was the greatest personage of Rome, had only one friend with him, who was Panetius the philosopher, and five domestics.^a Not his domestics, says an historian, but his victories were considered; he was not esteemed for his gold or his silver, but for his personal virtues and qualities. Though during their whole residence at Alexandria, the king caused them to be served with whatever was most delicate and exquisite, they never touched any thing but the most simple and common meats; despising all the rest, as serving only to enervate the mind as well as the body. So great, even at that time, were the moderation and temperance of the Romans; but luxury and pomp soon assumed their place.

When the ambassadors had fully viewed Alexandria, and regulated the affairs which brought them thither, they went up the Nile to visit Memphis, and the other parts of Egypt. They saw with their own eyes, or were informed upon the places themselves, the infinite number of cities, and the prodigious multitude of inhabitants contained in that kingdom; the strength of its natural situation; the fertility of its soil, and all the other advantages it enjoyed. They found that it wanted nothing to render it powerful and formidable but a prince of capacity and application; for ^a Cum per socios et exterarum gentes iter faceret, non mancipia sed victoriarum numerabantur; nec quantum auri et argenti, sed quantum amplitudinis onus secum ferret, aestimabatur. Val. Max.

Physon, who then reigned, was nothing less than a king. Nothing was so wretched as the idea he gave them of himself in all the audiences they had of him. Of his cruelty, luxury, barbarity, and other vices, I have already made mention, and shall be obliged to give further proofs of them in the sequel. The deformity of his ^b body sufficiently corresponded with that of his mind; nothing was ever worse put together. His statue was of the smallest, and with that he had a belly of so enormous a size that there was no man could embrace him in his arms. This largeness of his belly occasioned his being called by the nickname of Physcon. Upon this wretched person he wore so transparent a stuff that all his deformity might be seen through it. He never appeared in public but in a chariot, not being able to carry the load of flesh, which was the fruit of intemperance, unless when he walked with Scipio. So that the latter, turning towards Pannetius, told him in his ear, smiling, "The Alexandrians are obliged to us for seeing their king walk on foot."

We must confess, to the reproach of royalty, that most of the kings of whom we now speak, dishonoured not only the throne, but even human nature itself, by the most horrid vices. It is surprising to see, in that long list of kings, whose history we have related, how few there are who deserve that name. What comparison is there between those monsters of dissoluteness and cruelty, and Scipio Africanus, one of the three Roman ambassadors, who was as great a prodigy of wisdom and virtue as could be found amongst the Pagans. Justin accordingly says of him, that whilst he visited and considered with curiosity the rarities of Alexandria, he was himself a sight to the whole city. Dum inspicit urbem, ipse spectaculo Alexandrinis fuit.

^b Quam cruentus civibus, tam ridiculus Romanis fuit. Erat enim et vultu deformis, et statura brevis et sagina ventris non homini sed belluarum similis. Quam fœditatem nimia subtilitas perlucidæ vestis augebat, proorsus quasi astu inspiciendo præberentur, quæ omni studio occultantur pudibundo viro erant. Justin. l. viii. c. 8.

Athenæus says, πρὸς μὲν πάντοτε πεζὸς ἢ μὲν διὰ Σκιπίωνα. Which the interpreter translates, Pedibus ille numquam ex regia prodibat, sed perpetuo Scipione subnixus; instead of, nisi propter Scipionem.

Attalus, king of Pergamus, died about the times of which we now speak. His nephew, of the same name, called also Philometer, succeeded him. As the latter was very young when his father Eumenes died, he had been under the tuition of his uncle, to whom the crown was also left by the will of Eumenes. Attalus gave his nephew the best education he could; and at his death bequeathed the throne to him, though he had sons of his own; a proceeding as rare as it was laudable, most princes thinking no less of transferring their crowns to their posterity, than of preserving them to themselves during their lives.

This prince's death was a misfortune to the kingdom of Pergamus. Philometer governed it in the most extravagant and pernicious manner. He was scarce upon the throne before he stained it with the blood of his nearest relations, and the best friends of his house. He caused almost all who had served his father and uncle with extreme fidelity, to have their throats cut, under pretence that some of them had killed his mother Stratonice, who died of a disease in a very advanced age, and others his wife Berenice, who died of an incurable distemper, with which she had been taken very naturally. He put others also to death upon suspicions entirely frivolous; and with them, their wives, children, and whole families. He caused these executions to be committed by foreign troops, whom he had expressly sent for from the most savage and cruel of nations, to make them the instruments of his enormous barbarity.

^c A. M. 3866. Ant. J. C. 138. Justin. l. xxxvi. c. 4. Strab. l. xiii. p. 624. Plut. in Demet. p. 897. Diod. Excerpt. Vales. p. 370.

After having massacred and sacrificed to his fury in this manner the most deserving persons of his kingdom, he ceased to show himself abroad. He appeared no more in the city, and ate no longer in public. He put on old clothes, let his beard grow without taking any care of it, and did every thing which persons accused of capital crimes used to do in those days, as if he intended thereby to acknowledge his own late iniquity.

From hence he proceeded to other species of folly. He renounced the cares of state, retired into his garden, and applied to digging the ground himself, and sowing all sorts of venomous as well as wholesome herbs; then poisoning the good with the juice of the bad, he sent them in that manner as presents to his friends. He passed all the rest of his reign in cruel extravagances of the like nature, which, happily for his subjects, was of no long duration, for it lasted only five years.

He took it into his head to practice the trade of a founder, and formed the model of a monument of brass, to be erected to his mother. Whilst he was at work in casting the metal, on a hot summer's day, he was seized with a fever, which carried him off in seven days, and delivered his subjects from an abominable tyrant.

^d He had made a will, by which he appointed the Roman people his heirs. Eudemus of Pergamus carried this will to Rome. The principal article was expressed in these terms, ^e "Let the Roman people inherit all my fortunes." As soon as it was read, Tiberius Gracchus, tribune of the people, always attentive to conciliate their favour, took hold of the occasion, and ascending the tribunal of harangues, proposed a law to this effect; that all the ready money which should arise from the succession to this prince, should be distributed among the poor citizens, who should be sent as colonies into the country bequeathed to the Roman people, in order that they might have wherewithal to support themselves in their new possessions, and to supply them with the tools and other things necessary in agriculture. He added, that as to the cities and lands which were under that prince's government, the senate had no right to pass any decree in regard to them, and that he should leave the disposal of them to the people, which extremely offended the senate. That tribune was killed some small time after.

^f Aristonicus however, who reported himself of the blood royal, was active to take possession of Attalus's

^d A. M. 3871. Ant. J. C. 138.

^e Plut. in Gracch. Flor. l. ii. c. 20. Justin. l. xxxvi. c. 4. and xxxvii. c. 1. Vell. Patere. l. ii. c. 4. Strab. l. xiv. p. 646. Oros. l. v. c. 8—10. Eutrop. l. iv. Val. Max. l. iii. c. 2.

A. M. 3872. Ant. J. C. 132.

dominions. He was indeed the son of Eumenes by a courtesan. He easily engaged the majority of the cities in his party, because they had been long accustomed to the government of kings. Some cities, out of their fear of the Romans, refused at first to acknowledge him, but were compelled to it by force.

^g As his party grew stronger every day, the Romans sent the consul Crassus Mucianus against him. It was observed of this general, that he was so perfectly master of the dialects of the Greek tongue, which in a manner formed five different languages, that he pronounced his decrees according to the particular idiom of those who pleaded before him, which made him very agreeable to the states of Asia Minor. All the neighbouring princes in alliance with the Roman people, the kings of Bithynia, Pontus, Cappadocia and Paphlagonia, joined him with their troops.

^h Notwithstanding such powerful supports, having engaged in a battle with disadvantage, his army, which he commanded then in quality of proconsul, was defeated, and himself made prisoner. He avoided the shame of being put into the victor's hands by a voluntary death. His head was carried to Aristonicus, who caused his body to be interred at Smyrna.

The consul Perpenna, who had succeeded Crassus, soon revenged his death. Having made all haste into Asia, he gave Aristonicus battle, entirely routed his army, besieged him soon after in Stratonice, and at length made him prisoner. All Phrygia submitted to the Romans.

^g A. M. 3873. Ant. J. C. 131.

^h A. M. 3874. Ant. J. C. 130.

‡ He sent Aristonicus to Rome in the fleet which he loaded with Attalus's treasures. Manius Aquilius, who had lately been elected consul, was hastening to take his place, in order to put an end to this war, and deprive him of the honour of a triumph. He found Aristonicus set out; and some time after Perpenna, who had begun his journey, died of a disease at Pergamus. Aquilius soon terminated this war, which had continued almost four years. Lydia, Caria, the Hellespont, Phrygia, in a word, all that composed the kingdom of Attalus, was reduced into a province of the Roman empire, under the common name of Asia.

The senate had decreed, that the city of Phoecea, which had declared against the Romans, as well in the last war, as in that against Antiochus, should be destroyed. The inhabitants of Marseilles, which was a colony of Phoecea, moved as much with the danger of their founders, as if the fate of their own city had been in question, sent deputies to Rome to implore the clemency of the senate and people in their favour. As just as their indignation was against Phoecea, they could not refuse that favour to the ardent solicitations of a people, whom they had always held in the highest consideration, and who rendered themselves still more worthy of it, by the tender concern and gratitude they expressed for their forefathers and founders.

Phrygia Major was granted to Mithridates Evergetes, king of Pontus, in reward for the aid he had given the Romans in that war; but after his death they dispossessed his son, the great Mithridates of it, and declared it free.

Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, who died during this war, had left six children. Rome, to reward in the sons the services of the father, added Lycaonia and Cilicia to their dominions. They found in queen Laodice not the tenderness of a parent, but the cruelty of a stepmother. To secure all authority to herself, she poisoned five of her children, and the sixth would have had the same fate, if his relations had not taken him out of the murderous hands of that Megara, whose crimes the people soon revenged by a violent death.

* Manius Aquilius, at his return to Rome, received the honour of a triumph. Aristonicus, after having been shown there as a sight to the people, was carried to prison, where he was strangled. Such were the consequences of king Attalus's will.

Mithridates, in the letter which he wrote afterwards to Arsaces, king of Parthia, accuses the Romans of having forged a false will of Attalus's,¹ in order to deprive Aristonicus, the son of Eumenes, of his father's kingdom, which appertained to him of right; but it is a declared enemy who charges them with this. It is more surprising that Horace in one of his odes, seems to make the Roman people the same reproach, and to insinuate that they had attained the succession by fraud.

Neque Attali

Ignotus hæres regiam occupavi. Hor. Od. xviii. l. 51.

Nor have I seiz'd, an heir unknown,
The Phrygian's kingdom for my own.

* A. M. 3878. Ant. J. C. 126.

¹ Simulato impio testamento filium ejus (Eumenes) Aristonicum, quia patrium regnum petiverat, hostium more per triumphum duxere. Apud. Sallust. in Fragm.

However, there remains no trace in history of any secret intrigue or solicitation to that effect on the side of the Romans.

I thought it proper to relate all the consequences of this will, without interruption. I shall now resume the thread of my history.

SECTION V.

SIDETES TAKES JERUSALEM, AND THEN MAKES WAR AGAINST THE PARTHIANS. PHYSCON'S CRUELTY AND DEATH.

^m SIMON having been slain by treason, with two of his sons, John, another of them, surnamed Hyrcanus, was proclaimed high priest and prince of the Jews, in his father's stead. Here ends the history of the Maccabees.

Antiochus Sidetes, king of Syria, made all possible haste to take the advantage which the death of Simon gave him, and advanced at the head of a powerful army to reduce Judea, and unite it to the empire of Syria. Hyrcanus was obliged to shut himself up in Jerusalem, where he sustained a long siege with incredible valor. Reduced at length to the last extremity, for want of provisions, he caused proposals of peace to be made to the king. His condition was not known in the camp. Those who were about the king's person, pressed him to take the advantage of the present occasion for extirminating the Jewish nation. They represented to him, recurring to past ages, that they had been driven out of Egypt as impious wretches, hated by the gods, and abhorred by men ; that they were enemies to all the rest of mankind, as they had no communication with any but those of their own sect, and would neither eat, drink, nor have any familiarity with other people ; that they did not adore the same gods ; that they had laws, customs, and a religion entirely different from that of all other nations ; that therefore they well deserve to be treated by other nations with equal contempt, and to be rendered hatred for hatred ; and that all people ought to unite in extirpating them. Diodorus Siculus, as well as Josephus, says, that it was from the pure effect of the generosity and clemency of Antiochus, the Jewish nation was not entirely destroyed on this occasion.

^m A. M. 3869. Ant. J. C. 135. 1 Maccab. xvi. Joseph. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 16. Diod. Eclog. i. p. 99—101.

He was well pleased to enter into a treaty with Hyrcanus. It was agreed, that the besieged should surrender their arms ; that the fortifications of Jerusalem should be demolished ; and that a tribute should be paid to the king for Joppa, and for the other cities which the Jews had out of Judea ; the peace was concluded upon these conditions. Antiochus also demanded, that the citadel of Jerusalem should be rebuilt, and would have put a garrison into it ; but Hyrcanus would not consent to that, upon account of the miseries the nation had suffered from the garrison of the former citadel, and chose rather to pay the king the sum of five hundred talents,^a which he demanded as an equivalent. The capitulation was executed, and because it could not be immediately ratified, hostages were given, amongst whom was a brother of Hyrcanus.

^a Five hundred thousand crowns.

° Scipio Africanus the younger, going to command in Spain, during the war with Numantia, Antiochus Sidetes sent him rich and magnificent presents. Some generals would have appropriated them to their own use. Scipio received them in public, sitting upon his tribunal, in the view of the whole army, and gave orders that they should be delivered to the questor,^p to be applied in rewarding the officers and soldiers who should distinguish themselves in the service. By such conduct a generous and noble soul is known.

¶ Demetrius Nicator had been kept many years in captivity by the Parthians in Hyrcania, where he wanted nothing except liberty, without which all else is misery. He had made several attempts to obtain it, and to return into his own kingdom, but always without success. He was twice retaken in the midst of his flight, and punished only with being carried back to the place of his confinement, where he was guarded with more care, but always treated with the same magnificence. This was not the effect of mere goodness and clemency in the Parthians; interest had some share in it. They had views of making themselves masters of the kingdom of Syria, however remote they were, and waited a favourable opportunity, when, under colour of going to reestablish Demetrius upon the throne, they might take possession of it for themselves.

° A. M. 3870. Ant. J. C. 134. Epit. Liv. l. lvii.

^p The questor was the treasurer of the army.

¶ A. M. 3873. Ant. J. C. 131. Justin. l. xxxviii. c. 9, and 10. J. xxxix. c. 1. Oros. l. v. c. 1. Val. Max. l. ix. c. 1. Athen. l. v. p. 210, and l. x. p. 439. and l. xii. p. 540. Joseph. Antiq. l. xix. c. 16. Appian. in Syr. p. 132.

Antiochus Sidetes, whether apprized of this design or not, thought proper to prevent it, and marched against Phraates at the head of a formidable army. The Parthians' late usurpation of the richest and finest provinces of the east, which his ancestors had always possessed from the time of Alexander, was a strong inducement to him for uniting all his forces for their expulsion. His army was upwards of eighty thousand men, well armed and disciplined. But the train of luxury had added to it so great a multitude of sutlers, cooks, pastry cooks, confectioners, actors, musicians, and infamous women, that they were almost four times as many as the soldiers, and might amount to about three hundred thousand. There may be some exaggeration in this account; but if two thirds were deducted, there would still remain a numerous train of useless mouths. The luxury of the camp was in proportion to the number of those who administered to it. † Gold and silver glittered universally, even upon the legs of the private soldiers. The instruments and utensils of the kitchen were silver, as if they had been marching to a feast, and not to a war.

Antiochus had great success at first. He beat Phraates in three battles, and retook Babylonia and Media. All the provinces of the east, which had formerly appertained to the Syrian empire, threw off the Parthian yoke, and submitted to him, except Parthia itself, where Phraates found himself reduced within the narrow bounds of his ancient kingdom. Hyrcannus, prince of the Jews, accompanied Antiochus in this expedition, and having had his share in all these victories, returned home laden with glory, at the end of the campaign and the year.

† Argenti auriq̄ue tantum, ut etiam gregarii milites caligas auro figerent, proculcarentque materiam, cujus amore populi ferro dimicant. Culinarum quoque argentea instrumenta fuisse quasi ad epulas non ad bella, pergerent. Justin.

The rest of the army passed the winter in the east. The prodigious number of the troops, including the train before mentioned, obliged them to separate, and remove so far from each other, that they could not easily rejoin and form a body, in case of being attacked. The inhabitants, whom they insulted extremely in their quarters, to be revenged upon them, and to get rid of troublesome guests, that nothing could satisfy, conspired with the Parthians to massacre them all in one day in their quarters, without giving them time to assemble ; which was accordingly executed. Antiochus, who had kept a body of troops always about his person, marched to assist the quarters nearest him, but was overpowered by numbers, and perished himself. All the rest of the army were either massacred in their quarters the same day, or made prisoners ; so that out of so great a multitude, scarce any escaped to carry the sad news of this slaughter into Syria.

It occasioned great grief and consternation there. The death of Antiochus, a prince estimable for many excellent qualities, was particularly lamented. * Plutarch relates a saying of his, very much to his honour. One day having lost himself a hunting, and being alone, he retired into the cottage of some poor people who received him in the best manner they could, without knowing him. At supper, having himself turned the conversation upon the person and conduct of the king, they said, that he was in every thing else a good prince, but that his too great passion for hunting made him neglect the affairs of his kingdom, and repose too much confidence in his courtiers, whose actions did not always correspond with the goodness of his intentions. Antiochus made no answer at that time. The next day, upon the arrival of his train at the cottage, he was known. He repeated to his officers what had passed the evening before, and told them, by way of reproach, "Since I have taken you into my service I have not heard a truth concerning myself till yesterday."

* A. M. 3874. Ant. J. C. 130. Plut. in Apophthegm. p. 284.

Phraates, thrice beaten by Antiochus, had at last released Demetrius, and sent him back into Syria with a body of troops, in hopes that his return would occasion such troubles as would reduce Antiochus to follow him. But after the massacre, he detached a party of horse to retake him. Demetrius, who apprehended a countermand of that nature, had marched with so much diligence, that he had passed the Euphrates before that party arrived upon the frontier. In this manner he recovered his dominions, and made great rejoicings upon that occasion, whilst all the rest of Syria were in tears, deploring the loss of the army, in which few families had not some relation.

Phraates caused the body of Antiochus to be sought for amongst the dead, and put into a coffin of silver. He sent it into Syria to be honourably interred with his ancestors, and having found one of his daughters amongst the captives, he was struck with her beauty, and married her.

† Antiochus being dead, Hyrcanus took the advantage of the troubles and divisions which happened throughout the whole empire of Syria, to extend his dominions, by making himself master of many places in Syria, Phœnicia, and Arabia, which lay commodiously for him. He laboured also at the same time to render himself absolute and independent. He succeeded so well in that endeavour, that from thenceforth neither himself nor any of his descendants depended in the least upon the kings of Syria. They threw off entirely the yoke of subjection, and even that of homage.

‡ Phraates, flushed with his great successes, and the victory he had gained, was for carrying the war into Syria, to revenge Antiochus's invasion of his dominions. But, whilst he was making his preparations for that expedition, an unexpected war broke out with the Scythians, which found him employment enough at home, to remove all thoughts of disquieting others abroad. Finding himself vigorously pursued by Antiochus, as we have seen, he had demanded aid of that people. When they arrived, the affair was terminated, and having no further occasion for them, he would not give them the sums he had engaged to pay them. The Scythians immediately turned their arms against himself, to avenge themselves for the injustice he had done them.

† Joseph. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 17. Strab. l. xvi. p. 761. Justin. l. xxxvi. c. 1.

‡ A. M. 3875. Ant. J. C. 129 Justin. l. xxxix. c. 1. and l. xlii. c. 1. and 2.

It was a great error in this prince to have disgusted so powerful a nation by a mean and sordid avarice, and he committed a second, no less considerable, in the war itself. To strengthen himself against that nation, he sought aid from a people to whom he had made himself more hateful than to the Scythians themselves; these were the Greek foreign troops, who had been in the pay of Antiochus in the last war against him, and had been made prisoners. Phraates thought proper to incorporate them into his own troops; believing that he should considerably reinforce them by that means. But when they saw themselves with arms in their hands, they were resolved to be revenged for the injuries and ill treatment they had suffered, during their captivity; and, as soon as the armies engaged, they went over to the enemy, and gave such a turn to the battle, whilst the victory was in suspense, that Phraates was defeated with a great slaughter of his troops. He perished himself in the pursuit, and almost his whole army. The Scythians and Greeks contented themselves with plundering the country, and then retired to their several homes.

When they were gone, Artaban, Phraates's uncle, caused himself to be crowned king of the Parthians. He was killed some days after in a battle with the Thogarians, another Scythian nation. Mithridates was his successor, who, for his glorious actions, was surnamed the Great.

During all these revolutions in the Syrian and Parthian empires, Ptolemy Physcon did not alter his conduct in Egypt. I have already observed, that on his marriage with his sister Cleopatra, who was his brother's widow, he had killed the son she had by his brother in her arms, on the very day of their nuptials. Afterwards, having taken a disgust for the mother, he fell passionately in love with one of her daughters by Philometer, called also Cleopatra. He began by violating her, and then married her, after turning away her mother.

† A. M. 3874. Ant. J. C. 130. Justin. l. xxxviii. c. 8, 9. l. xxxix. c. 1. Val. Max. l. ix. c. 2—7. Oros. l. v. c. 10. Epit. l. lix. lx. Diod. in Excerpt. Vales. p. 374—376. Joseph. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 17.

He soon made himself hated also by the new inhabitants of Alexandria, whom he had drawn thither to re-people it, and supply the places of those his first cruelties had obliged to abandon their country. To put them out of a condition to do him hurt, he resolved to have the throats cut of all the young men in the city, of whom its whole force consisted. For that purpose, he caused them to be invested one day by his foreign troops in the place of exercise, when the assembly there was most numerous, and put them all to the sword. The whole people ran in a fury to set fire to the palace, and to burn him in it; but he had quitted it before they arrived there, and made his escape into Cyprus, with his wife Cleopatra, and his son Memphitis. Upon his arrival there, he was informed that the people of Alexandria had put the government into the hands of Cleopatra, whom he had repudiated. He immediately raised troops to make war upon the new queen and her adherents.

¶ But first, apprehending that the Alexandrians would make his son king, to whom he had given the government of Cyrenaica, he caused him to come to him, and put him to death as soon as he arrived, only to prevent a pretended danger, which had no foundation but in his falsely alarmed imagination. That barbarity enraged every body the more against him. They pulled down and dashed to pieces all his statues in Alexandria. He believed that Cleopatra, whom he had repudiated, had induced the people to this action; and to be revenged of her, ordered the throat of Memphitis to be cut, a young prince whom he had by her, of great beauty and hopes. He afterwards caused the body to be cut in pieces, and put into a chest, with the head entire, that it might be known, and sent it by one of his guards to Alexandria, with orders to wait till the birth day of that princess, which approached, and was to be celebrated with great magnificence, and then to present it to her. His orders were obeyed. The chest was delivered to her in the midst of the rejoicings of the feast, which were immediately changed into mourning and lamentations. The horror cannot be expressed, which the view of that sad object excited against the tyrant, whose monstrous barbarity had perpetrated so unnatural and unheard of a crime. The abominable present was exposed to the view of the public, with whom it had the same effect as with the court, who had first seen that sad spectacle. The people ran to their arms, and nothing was thought of, but how to prevent that monster from ever reascending the throne. An army was formed, and the command of it given to Marsyas, whom the queen had appointed general; and all the necessary precautions were taken for the defence of the country.

¶ A. M. 3875. Ant. J. C. 129.

Ptolemy Physcon having raised an army on his side, gave the command of it to Hegelochus, and sent him against the Alexandrians. A battle was fought, and gained by Hegelochus. He even took Marsyas prisoner, and sent him laden with chains to Physcon; it was expected that so bloody a tyrant would have put him to death in the most exquisite torments, but the contrary happened. He gave him his pardon, and set him at liberty; for finding by experience, that his cruelties only drew misfortunes upon him, he began to abate in them, and was for doing himself honour by his lenity. Cleopatra, reduced to great extremities by the loss of her army, which was almost entirely cut to pieces in the pursuit, sent to demand aid of Demetrius king of Syria, who had married her eldest daughter by Philometer, and promised him the crown of Egypt for his reward. Demetrius, without hesitation, accepted the proposal, marched with all his troops, and laid siege to Pelusium.

That prince was no less hated by the Syrians for his haughtiness, tyranny, and excesses, than Physcon by the Egyptians. When they saw him at a distance, and employed in the siege of Pelusium, they took up arms. The people of Antioch began, and after them those of Apamea, with many other cities of Syria, followed their example, and joined with them. Demetrius was obliged to leave Egypt in order to reduce his own subjects to obedience. Cleopatra, destitute of the aid she expected from him, embarked with all her treasures, and took refuge with her daughter Cleopatra, queen of Syria.

This Cleopatra, the daughter, had been first married to Alexander Bala, and afterwards to Demetrius, in the life time of her father Philometer. But Demetrius having been taken prisoner by the Parthians, and detained amongst them, she had married Antiochus Sidetes, Demetrius's brother. After the death of Sidetes, she returned to Demetrius her first husband, who being set at liberty by the Parthians, had repossessed himself of Syria ; she kept her court at Ptolemais when her mother came to her.

* Physcon, as soon as Cleopatra had abandoned Alexandria, returned thither, and reassumed the government ; for after the defeat of Marsyas, and the flight of Cleopatra, there was nobody in condition to oppose him. After having employed some time in strengthening himself, to revenge the invasion of Demetrius, he set up an impostor against him, called Alexander Zebina. He was the son of a broker of Alexandria. He gave himself out for the son of Alexander Bala, and pretended, in that quality, that the crown of Syria was his right. Physcon lent him an army to put him in possession of it. He was no sooner in Syria, than, without examining the justice of his pretensions, the people came in crowds to join him, out of their hatred to Demetrius. They were in no pain about the person who was to be their king, provided they got rid of him.

At length a battle decided the affair. It was fought near Damascus in Celosyria. Demetrius was entirely defeated, and fled to Ptolemais, where his wife Cleopatra was. She, who had always at heart his marriage with Rhodoguna amongst the Parthians, took this occasion to be revenged, and caused the gates of the city to be shut against him. Would not one think, that in the age of which we now treat, there was a kind of dispute and emulation between the princes and princesses who should distinguish themselves most by wickedness and the blackest crimes? Demetrius was obliged to fly to Tyre, where he was killed. After his death, Cleopatra reserved to herself part of the kingdom; Zebina had all the rest; and to establish himself the better, made a strict alliance with Hyrcanus, who, as an able statesman, took the advantage of these divisions to strengthen himself, and to obtain for his people the confirmation of their liberty, and many other considerable advantages, which rendered the Jews formidable to their enemies.

† He had sent the preceding year an embassy to Rome, to renew the treaty made with Simon his father. The senate received those ambassadors very graciously, and granted them all they demanded. And because Antiochus Sidetes had made war against the Jews, contrary to the decree of the Romans, and his alliance with Simon; that he had taken several cities; had made them pay tribute for Gazara, Joppa, and some other places, of which he had made cession to them; and had made them consent by force to a disadvantageous peace, by besieging the city of Jerusalem; upon what the ambassadors represented to the senate on these heads, they condemned all that had been done in such manner against the Jews, from the treaty made with Simon, and resolved that Gazara, Joppa, and the rest of the places taken from them by the Syrians, or which had been made tributary, contrary to the tenor of that treaty, should be restored to them, and exempted from all homage, tribute, or other subjection. It was also concluded, that the Syrians should make amends for all losses that the Jews had sustained from them, in contravention to the senate's regulations in the treaty concluded with Simon; in fine, that the kings of Syria should renounce their pretended right to march their troops upon the territories of the Jews.

† Joseph: Antiq. l. xiii. c. 17.

² At the time we speak of, incredible swarms of grasshoppers laid Africa waste in an unheard of manner. They eat up all the fruits of the earth, and afterwards, being carried by the wind into the sea, their dead bodies were thrown by the waves upon the shore, where they rotted, and infected the air to such a degree, that they occasioned a pestiience, which carried off in Lybia, Cyrenaica, and some other parts of Africa, more than eight hundred thousand souls.

³ We have said, that Cleopatra had possessed herself of part of the kingdom of Syria at the death of Demetrius Nicator, her husband. He left two sons by that princess, the eldest of whom, called Seleucus, conceived hopes of ascending the throne of his father, and accordingly caused himself to be declared king. His ambitious mother was for reigning alone, and was very much offended at her son's intention to establish himself to her prejudice. She had also reason to fear, that he might desire to avenge his father's death, of which it was well known she had been the cause. She killed him with her own hands, by plunging a dagger into his breast. He reigned only one year. It is hardly conceivable how a woman, and a mother, could be capable of committing so horrid and excessive a crime ; but, when some unjust passion takes possession of the heart, it becomes the source of every kind of guilt. As gentle as it appears, it is not far from arming itself with poniards, and from having recourse to poison ; because, urgent for the attainment of its ends, it has a natural tendency to destroy every thing which opposes that view.

² A. M. 3879. Ant. J. C. 125. Liv. Epit. l. ix. Oros. l. v. c. 11.

³ A. M. 3880. Ant. J. C. 124. Liv. Epit. l. ix. Justin. l. xxxix. c. 1, 2. Appian. in Syr. p. 132.

Zabina had made himself master of part of the kingdom of Syria. Three of his principal officers revolted against him, and declared for Cleopatra. They took the city of Laodicea, and resolved to defend that place against him ; but he found means to reconcile them. They submitted, and he pardoned them with the most uncommon clemency and greatness of soul, and without doing them any hurt. This pretended prince had in reality an exceeding good heart. He received all who approached him in the most affable and engaging manner, so that he acquired the love of all men, and even of those who abhorred the imposture by which he had usurped the crown.

Mithridates Evergetes, king of Pontus, died this year ; he was assassinated by his own servants. His son, who succeeded him, was the famous Mithridates Eupater, who disputed so long the empire of Asia with the Romans, and supported a war of almost thirty years duration against them. He was but twelve years of age when his father died. I shall make his history a separate article.

^b Cleopatra, after having killed her eldest son, believed it for her interest to make a titular king, under whose name she might conceal the authority she intended to retain entirely to herself. She rightly distinguished, that a warlike people, accustomed to be governed by kings, would always regard the throne as vacant, whilst filled only by a princess, and that they would not fail to offer it to any prince that should set up for it. She therefore caused her other son, Antiochus to return from Athens, whither she had sent him for his education, and ordered him to be declared king as soon as he arrived. But that was no more than an empty title. She gave him no share in the affairs of the government; and as that prince was very young, being no more than twenty years of age, he suffered her to govern for some time with patience enough. To distinguish him from other princes of the name of Antiochus, he was generally called by the surname of Grypus,^c taken from his great nose. Josephus calls him Philometer; but that prince in his medals took the title of Epiphanes.

^d Zebina having well established himself, after the death of Demetrius Nicator, in the possession of part of the Syrian empire, Physcon, who looked upon him as his creature, insisted upon his doing him homage for it. Zebina refused in direct terms to comply with that demand. Physcon resolved to throw him down as he had set him up, and having accommodated all differences with his niece Cleopatra, he sent a considerable army to the assistance of Grypus, and gave him his daughter Tryphena in marriage. Grypus, by the means of this aid, defeated Zebina, and obliged him to retire to Antioch. The latter formed a design of plundering the temple of Jupiter, to defray the expenses of the war. Upon its being discovered, the inhabitants rose and drove him out of the city. He wandered some time about the country from place to place, but was taken at last, and put to death.

^b A. M. 3881. Ant. J. C. 123.

^c Γρυπες, in Greek, signifies a man with an aquiline nose.

^d A. M. 3882. Ant. J. C. 122.

• After the defeat and death of Zebina, Antiochus Grypus, believing himself of sufficient years, resolved to take the government upon himself. The ambitious Cleopatra, who saw her power diminished, and grandeur eclipsed by that means, could not suffer it. To render herself absolute mistress of the government of Syria again, she resolved to rid herself of Grypus, as she had already done of his brother Seleucus, and to give the crown to another of her sons by Antiochus Sidetes, under whom, being an infant, she was in hopes of possessing the royal authority for many years, and of taking such measures as might establish her in it, during her life. This wicked woman prepared a poisoned draught for that purpose, which she presented to Grypus one day, as he returned very hot from some exercise. But that prince having been apprized of her design, desired her first, by way of respect, to drink the cup herself; and upon her obstinate refusal to do it, having called in some witnesses, he gave her to understand, that the only means she had to clear herself of the suspicion conceived of her, was to drink the liquor she had presented to him. That unhappy woman, who found herself without evasion or resource, swallowed the draught. The poison had its effect immediately, and delivered Syria from a monster, who by her unheard of crimes, had been so long the scourge of the state. She had been the wife of three kings of Syria,^f and the mother of four. She had occasioned the death of two of her husbands, and as to her children, she had murdered one with her own hands, and would have destroyed Grypus by the poison he made her drink herself. That prince afterwards applied himself with success to the affairs of the public, and reigned several years in peace and tranquillity, till his brother, Antiochus of Cyzicum, occasioned the troubles we shall relate hereafter.

• A. M. 3884. Ant. J. C. 120.

^g Ptolemy Physcon, king of Egypt, after having reigned twenty nine years from the death of his brother Philometer, died at last in Alexandria. No reign was ever more tyrannical, nor abounded with more crimes than his.

^f The three kings of Syria, who had been her husbands, were Alexander Bala, Demetrius Nicator, and Antiochus Sidetes. Her four sons were Antiochus, by Alexander Bala; Seleucus and Antiochus Grypus, by Demetrius; and Antiochus the Cyzicenian, by Antiochus Sidetes.

^g Porphyr. in Græc. Euseb. Scal. Hieron. in Dan. ix.

SECTION VI.

PTOLEMY LATHYRUS SUCCEEDS PHYSCON. CONTINUATION OF THE WARS IN SYRIA AND EGYPT.

^b PHYSCON, at his death, left three sons. The first, named Apion, was a natural son, whom he had by a concubine. The two others were legitimate, and the children of his niece Cleopatra, whom he married after having repudiated her mother. The eldest was called Lathyrus, and the other Alexander. He left the kingdom of Cyrenaica by will to Apion, and Egypt to his widow Cleopatra, and to which of his two sons she should think fit to choose. Cleopatra, believing that Alexander would be the most complaisant, resolved to choose him; but the people would not suffer the eldest to lose his right of birth, and obliged the queen to recal him from Cyprus, whither she had caused him to be banished by his father, and to associate him with her on the throne. Before she would suffer him to take possession of the crown, she obliged him to repudiate his eldest sister Cleopatra, whom he passionately loved, and to take Selena, his younger sister, for whom he had no inclination. Dispositions of this kind promise no very pacific reign.

At his coronation he took the title of Soter. Some authors give him that of Philometer; but the generality of historians distinguish him by the name of ^b A. M. 3887. Ant. J. C. 117. Justin. l. xxxix. c. 4, 5. Appian. in Mithrid. sub finem et in Syr. p. 132. Strab. l. xvii. p. 795. Plin. l. ii. c. 67, and l. vi. c. 30. Porphy. in Græc. Euseb. Scalig. Joseph. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 18. Diod. in Excerpt. Vales. p. 385.

Lathyrus.ⁱ However as that is but a kind of nickname, nobody dared to give it him in his own time.

Antiochus Grypus, king of Syria, was making preparations for invading Judea, when a civil war broke out to employ him, fomented by Antiochus of Cyzicum, his brother by the mother's side. He was the son of Antiochus Sidetes, and born whilst Demetrius was prisoner amongst the Parthians. When Demetrius returned, and repossessed himself of his dominions after the death of Antiochus Sidetes, his mother, out of regard to his safety, had sent him to Cyzicum, a city situate upon the propontis, in Mysia Minor, where he was educated by the care of a faithful eunuch, named Craterus, to whom she had intrusted him. From thence he was called the Cyziceni- an. Grypus, to whom he gave umbrage, was for having him poisoned. His design was discovered, and the Cyziceni- an was reduced to take up arms in his own defence, and to endeavour to make good his pretensions to the crown of Syria.

^l Cleopatra, whom Lathyrus had been obliged to repudiate, finding herself at her own disposal, married the Cyziceni- an. She brought him an army ^m for her ⁱ Λαθυρος signifies a kind of pea, called in Latin "cicer," from which came the surname of Cicero. Lathyrus must have had some very visible mark of this sort upon his face, or the name had been inconsistent.

^k A. M. 3890. Ant. J. C. 114.

^l A. M. 3891. Ant. J. C. 113.

^m We find in the latter editions of Justin the following words ; "Exercitum Grypi, sollicitatum, velut dotalem, ad maritum deducit;" which shows that Cleopatra having succeeded in corrupting part of Grypus's army, carried it to her husband. Several editions read, "Cypri" instead of "Grypi," which implies, that Cleopatra had an army in Cyprus.

dowry, to assist him against his competitor. Their forces by that means, being very near equal, the two brothers came to a battle, in which the Cyzicenean having the misfortune to be defeated, retired to Antioch. He left his wife for her security in that place, and went himself to raise new troops for the reinforcement of his army.

But Grypus immediately laid siege to the city, and took it. Tryphena, his wife, was very earnest with him to put Cleopatra, his prisoner, into her hands. Though her sister by father and mother, she was so excessively enraged at her for having married their enemy, and given him an army against them, that she resolved to deprive her of life. Cleopatra had taken refuge in a sanctuary, which was held inviolable; Grypus would not have a complaisance for his wife, which he saw would be attended with fatal effects, from the violence of her rage. He alleged to her the sanctity of the asylum, where her sister had taken refuge; and represented that her death would neither be of use to them, nor of prejudice to the Cyzicenean; that in all the civil or foreign wars, wherein his ancestors had been engaged, it had never been known after victory, that any cruelty had been exercised against the women, especially so near relations; that Cleopatra was her sister, and his near relation;* that therefore he desired her to speak no more of her to him, because he could by no means consent to her being treated with any severities. ° Tryphena, far from giving in to his reasons, became more violent by conceiving jealousy ; and imagining that it was not from the motive of compassion, but love, that her husband took the part of that unfortunate princess in such a manner ; she therefore sent soldiers into the temple, who could not tear her in any other manner from the altar, than by cutting off her hands with which she embraced it. Cleopatra expired, uttering a thousand curses against the parricides who were the authors of her death, and imploring the god, in whose sight so barbarous a cruelty was committed, to avenge her upon them.

* Her father Physcon was the uncle of Cleopatra, Grypus's mother.

° Sed quanto Grypus, abnuit, tanto furor muliebri pertinacia accenditur; rata non misericordiae hæc verba, sed amoris esse. Justin.

However, the other Cleopatra, the common mother of the two sisters, did not seem to be affected at all with either the fate of the one, or the crime of the other. Her heart, which was solely susceptible of ambition, was so taken up with the desire of reigning, that she had no other thoughts than of the means of supporting herself in Egypt, and of retaining an absolute authority in her own hands, during her life. To strengthen herself the better, she gave the kingdom of Cyprus to Alexander her youngest son, in order to draw from him the assistance she might have occasion for, in case Lathyrus should ever dispute the authority she was determined to keep.

^p The death of Cleopatra in Syria, did not long remain unpunished. The Cyzicenan returned at the head of a new army, to give his brother battle a second time, defeated him, and took Tryphena, upon whom he inflicted the torments her cruelty to her sister had well deserved.

' Grypus was obliged to abandon Syria to the victor. He retired to Aspendus in Pamphylia, which occasioned his being sometimes called in history the Aspendian, but returned a year after into Syria and repossessed himself of it. The two brothers at length divided that empire between them. The Cyzicenean had Celosyria and Phenicia, and took up his residence at Damascus. Grypus had all the rest, and kept his court at Antioch. Both gave alike into luxury, and many other excesses.

† Whilst the two brothers were exhausting their forces against one another, or indolently doted after the peace in luxurious sloth and ease, John Hyrcanus augmented his wealth and power; and seeing that he had nothing to fear from them, he undertook to reduce the city of Samaria. He sent Aristobulus and Antigonus, two of his sons, to form the siege of that place. The Samaritans demanded aid of the Cyzicenean, king of Damascus, who marched thither at the head of an army. The two brothers quitted their lines, and a battle ensued, wherein Antiochus was defeated, and pursued as far as Scythopolis, escaping with great difficulty.

• The two brothers, after this victory, returned to the siege, and pressed the city so vigorously, that it was obliged a second time to send to the Cyzicenean, to solicit him to come again to its aid. But he had not troops enough to undertake the raising of the siege; and Lathyrus, king of Egypt, was treated with upon the same head, who granted six thousand men, contrary to the opinion of Cleopatra his mother. As Chelcias and Ananias, two Jews, were her favourites, both ministers and generals, the sons of Onias, who built the temple of Egypt; those two ministers, who entirely governed her, influenced her in favour of their nation, and out of regard for them, she would not do any thing to the prejudice of the Jews. She was almost resolved to depose Lathyrus for having engaged in this war without her consent, and even against her will.

† A. M. 3893. Ant. J. C. 111.

• A. M. 3894. Ant. J. C. 110. Joseph. Antiq. l. xiii. 17—19.

• A. M. 3895. Ant. J. C. 109.

When the auxiliary troops of Egypt arrived, the Cyzicenan joined them with his. He was afraid to attack the army that formed the siege, and contented himself, with flying parties and excursions to ravage the country by way of diversion, and to reduce the enemy to raise the siege, in order to defend themselves at home. But seeing that the Jewish army did not move, and that his own was much diminished by the defeat of some parties, desertion, and other accidents, he thought it improper to expose his person by continuing in the field with an army so much weakened, and retired to Tripoli. He left the command of his troops to two of his best generals, Callimander and Epicrates. The first was killed in a rash enterprise, in which his whole party perished with him. Epicrates, seeing no hopes of success, had no further thoughts but of serving his private interest in the best manner he could, in the present situation of affairs. He treated secretly with Hyrcanus, and for a sum of money put Scythopolis into his hands, with all the other places which the Syrians possessed in the country, without regard to his duty, honour and reputation ; and all for a sum perhaps inconsiderable enough.

Samaria, destitute of all appearance of relief, was obliged, after having sustained a siege for a year, to surrender at last to Hyrcanus, who immediately ordered it to be demolished. The walls of the city and houses of the inhabitants, were entirely razed, and laid level with the ground ; and, to prevent its being rebuilt, he caused large and deep ditches to be cut through the plain where the city had stood, into which water was turned. It was not reestablished till the time of Herod, who gave the new city he caused to be built there, the name of Sebastos,[†] in honour of Augustus.

▪ Hyrcanus saw himself at that time master of all Judea, Galilee, Samaria, and of many places upon the frontiers, and became thereby one of the most considerable princes of his times. None of his neighbours dared to attack him any more, and he passed the rest of his days in perfect tranquillity with regard to foreign affairs.

∨ But towards the close of his life he did not find the same repose at home. The Pharisees, a violent and rebellious sect, gave him abundance of difficulties. By an affected profession of an attachment to the law, and a severity of manners, they had acquired a reputation which gave them great sway amongst the people. Hyrcanus had endeavoured by all sorts of favours, to engage them in his interests. Besides, having been educated amongst them, and having always professed himself of their sect, he had protected and served them upon all occasions ; and to make them more firmly his adherents, not long before he had invited the heads of them to a magnificent entertainment, in which he made a speech to them, highly capable of affecting rational minds. He represented, that it had always been his intention, as they well knew, to be just in his actions towards men, and to do all things in regard to God, that might be agreeable to him, according to the doctrine taught by the Pharisees ; that he conjured them therefore, if they saw that he departed in any thing from the great end he proposed to himself in those two rules, that they would give him their instructions, in order to his amending and correcting his errors. Such a disposition is highly laudable in princes, and in all men ; but it ought to be attended with prudence and discernment.

[†] Σεβαστος in Greek signifies Augustus.

▪ A. M. 3896. Ant. J. C. 108.

∨ A. M. 3899. Ant. J. C. 105.

The whole assembly applauded this discourse, and highly praised him for it. One man only, named Eleazar, of a turbulent and seditious spirit, rose up, and spoke to him to this effect ; “ Since you desire that the truth should be told you with freedom, if you would prove yourself just, renounce the high priesthood, and content yourself with the civil government.” Hyrcanus was surprised, and asked him what reasons he had to give him such counsel. Eleazar replied, that it was known, from the testimony of ancient persons worthy of belief, that his mother was a captive, and that as the son of a stranger, he was incapable by the law of holding that office. If the fact had been true, Eleazar ^w would have had reason ; for the law was express in that point ; but it was a false supposition, and a mere calumny ; and all who were present extremely blamed him for having advanced it, and expressed great indignation upon that account.

This adventure, however occasioned great troubles. Hyrcanus was highly incensed at so insolent an attempt to defame his mother, and call in question the purity of his birth, and, in consequence, his right to the high priesthood. Jonathan, his intimate friend, and a zealous Sadducee, took the advantage of this opportunity to incense him against the whole party, and to bring him over to that of the Sadducees.

Two powerful sects in Judea, but directly opposite to each other in sentiments and interests, entirely divided the state ; that of the Pharisees, and that of the Sadducees. The first piqued themselves upon an exact observance of the law ; to which they added a great number of traditions, that they pretended to have received from their ancestors, and to which they much more strictly adhered than to the law itself, though often contrary to each other. They acknowledged the immortality of the soul, and, in consequence, another life after this. They affected an outside of virtue, regularity and austerity, which acquired them great consideration with the people. But under that imposing appearance, they concealed the greatest vices ; sordid avarice ; insupportable pride ; an insatiable thirst of honours and distinctions ; a violent desire of ruling alone ; an envy that rose almost to fury, against all merit but their own ; an irreconcilable hatred for all who presumed to contradict them ; a spirit of revenge capable of the most horrid excesses ; and, what was still their more distinguishing characteristic, and outdid all the rest, a black hypocrisy, which always wore the mask of religion. The Sadducees rejected the pharisaical traditions with contempt ; denied the immortality of the soul, and the resurrection of the body ; and admitted no felicity but that to be enjoyed in this life. The rich people, nobility, and most of those who composed the sanhedrim, that is to say, the great council of the Jews, in which the affairs of state and religion were determined, were of the latter sect.

^w Lev. xxiv. 15.

Jonathan therefore, to bring over Hyrcanus into his party, insinuated to him that what had passed was not the mere suggestion of Eleazar, but a trick concerted by the whole cabal, of which Eleazar had only been the tool ; and that, to convince him of the truth, he had only to consult them upon the punishment which the calumniator deserved ; that he would find, if he thought fit to make the experiment, by their conduct in favour of the criminal, that they were all of them his accomplices. Hyrcanus followed his advice, and consulted the principle of the Pharisees upon the punishment due to him who had so grossly defamed the prince and high priest of his people, expecting that they would undoubtedly condemn him to die. But their answer was, that calumny was not a capital crime ; and that all the punishment he deserved, was to be scourged and imprisoned. So much lenity in so heinous a case, made Hyrcanus believe all that Jonathan had insinuated ; and he became the mortal enemy of the whole sect of the Pharisees. He prohibited, by a decree, the observation of the rules founded upon their pretended tradition ; inflicted penalties upon such as disobeyed that ordinance ; and abandoned their party entirely, to throw himself into that of the Sadducees, their enemies.

* Hyrcanus did not long survive this storm ; he died the year following, after having been high priest and prince of the Jews twenty nine years.

Not to interrupt the history of other kingdoms, I shall reserve the greatest part of what regards the successors of Hyrcanus, for the article in which I shall treat the history of the Jews separately.

† We have seen that Ptolemy Lathyrus had sent an army into Palestine to aid Samaria, contrary to the advice of his mother, and notwithstanding her opposition. She carried her resentment so high upon this attempt, and some others of a like nature, against her authority, that she took his wife Selena from him, by whom he had two sons,^z and obliged him to quit Egypt. Her method to do this, was to have some of his favourite eunuchs wounded, and produced in an assembly of the people at Alexandria. She caused it to be reported, that he had used them so barbarously for having endeavoured to defend her against his violence, and inflamed the people so much by this black fiction, which convinced them that he designed to kill her, that they immediately rose universally against Lathyrus, and would have torn him in pieces, if he had not escaped from the port in a ship, which set sail as soon as he got on board. Cleopatra sent soon after for Alexander her youngest son, to whom she had given the kingdom of Cyprus, and made him king of Egypt in his brother's stead, whom she obliged to content himself with the kingdom of Cyprus, which the other quitted.

* A. M. 3897. Ant. J. C. 107.

† Justin. l. xxxviii. c. 4.

^z Those two sons died before him.

^a Alexander, king of the Jews, after having put the internal affairs of his kingdom in good order, marched against the people of Ptolemais, beat them, and obliged them to shut themselves up within their walls, where he besieged them. They sent to demand aid of Lathyrus, who went thither in person. But the besieged changing their sentiments, from the apprehension of having him for their master, Lathyrus dissembled his resentment for the present. He was upon the point of concluding a treaty with Alexander, when he was apprized that the latter was negotiating secretly with Cleopatra, to engage her to join him with all her forces, in order to drive him out of Palestine. Lathyrus became his declared enemy, and resolved to do him all the hurt he could.

The next year he did not fail in that point. He divided his army into two bodies, and detached one of them, under the command of one of his generals, to form the siege of Ptolemais, with which place he had reason to be dissatisfied; and with the other marched in person against Alexander. The inhabitants of Gaza supplied Lathyrus with a considerable number of troops. A bloody battle was fought between them upon the banks of the Jordan. Alexander lost thirty thousand men, without including the prisoners taken by Lathyrus after the victory.

^a A. M. 3899. Ant. J. C. 105. Joseph. Antiq. l. xiii. 20, 21.

A most cruel and horrid action is related of Lathyrus upon this occasion. The same evening he gained this battle, in going to take up his quarters in the neighbouring villages, he found them full of women and children, and caused them all to be put to the sword, and their bodies to be cut in pieces, and put into cauldrons, in order to their being dressed, as if he intended to make his army sup upon them. His design was to have it believed that his troops ate human flesh, to spread the greater terror throughout the country. Could one believe such a barbarity possible, or that any man should ever conceive so wild a thought? Josephus reports this fact upon the authority of Strabo, and another author.

Lathyrus, after the defeat of Alexander, not having any enemy in the field, ravaged and laid waste all the flat country. Without the succours brought by Cleopatra the following year, Alexander had been undone; for, after so considerable a loss, it was impossible for him to retrieve his affairs, and make head against his enemy.

‡ That princess saw plainly that if Lathyrus made himself master of Judea and Phenicia, he would be in a condition to enter Egypt, and to dethrone her; and that it was necessary to put a stop to his progress. For that purpose she raised an army, and gave the command of it to Chelcias and Ananias, the two Jews of whom we have spoken before. She fitted out a fleet at the same time, to transport her troops; and, embarking with them herself, landed in Phenicia.^c She carried with her a great sum of money and her richest jewels. For their security, in case of accident, she chose the isle of Cos for their repository, and sent thither at the same time her grandson Alexander, the son of him who reigned jointly with her. When Mithridates made himself master of that island, and of the treasures laid up there, he took that young prince into his care, and gave him an education suitable to his birth. Alexander withdrew by stealth from Mithridates, some time after, and took refuge with Sylla, who received him well, took him into his protection, carried him to Rome, and at length set him upon the throne of Egypt, as we shall see in the sequel.

‡ A. M. 3901. Ant. J. C. 103.

The arrival of Cleopatra made Lathyrus immediately raise the siege of Ptolemais, which he had continued till then. He retired into Celosyria. She detached Chelcias with part of her army to pursue him, and with the other, commanded by Ananias, formed the siege of Ptolemais herself. Chelcias, who commanded the first detachment, having been killed in the expedition, his death put a stop to every thing. Lathyrus, to take advantage of the disorder occasioned by that loss, threw himself, with all his forces into Egypt, in hopes of finding it without defence in the absence of his mother, who had carried her best troops into Phenicia. He was mistaken. ^dThe troops Cleopatra had left there, made head till the arrival of those she detached to reinforce them from Phenicia, upon receiving advice of his design. He was reduced to return into Palestine, and took up his winter quarters in Gaza.

^c Appian. in Mithrid. p. 185. Et de bel. civil. p. 414.

^d A. M., 3902. Ant. J. C. 102.

Cleopatra, however, pushed the siege of Ptolemais with so much vigor, that she at last took it. As soon as she entered it, Alexander made her a visit, and brought rich presents with him to recommend him to her favour. But what conduced most to his success, was her hatred for her son Lathyrus ; which was alone sufficient to assure him of a good reception.

Some persons of Cleopatra's court observed to her, that she had now a fair opportunity of making herself mistress of Judea, and all Alexander's dominions, by seizing his person ; they even pressed her to take the advantage of it, which she would have done, had it not been for Ananias. But he represented to her how base and infamous it would be to treat an ally in that manner, engaged with her in the same cause ; that it would be acting contrary to honour and faith, which are the foundations of society ; that such a conduct would be highly prejudicial to her interests, and would draw upon her the abhorrence of all the Jews dispersed throughout the world. In fine, he so effectually used his reasons and credit, which he employed to the utmost, for the preservation of his countryman and relation, that she came into his opinion, and renewed her alliance with Alexander. Of what value to princes is a wise minister, who has courage enough to oppose their unjust undertakings with vigor ! Alexander returned to Jerusalem, where he at length set another good army on foot, with which he passed the Jordan, and formed the siege of Gadara.

^e Ptolemy Lathyrus, after having wintered at Gaza, perceiving that his efforts would be ineffectual against Palestine, whilst his mother supported it, abandoned that design, and returned into Cyprus. She, on her side, retired also into Egypt, and the country was delivered from them both.

^f Being informed upon her return into Alexandria, that Lathyrus had entered into a treaty at Damascus, with Antiochus the Cyzicenean, and that, with the aid he expected from him, he was preparing to make a new attempt for the recovery of the crown of Egypt; that queen, to make a diversion, gave her daughter Selena, whom she had taken from Lathyrus, to Antiochus Grypus, and sent him at the same time, a considerable number of troops, and great sums of money, to put him in a condition to attack his brother, the Cyzicenean, with vigor. The affair succeeded as she had intended. The war was renewed between the two brothers, and the Cyzicenean had so much employment upon his hands at home, that he was in no condition to assist Lathyrus, who was thereby obliged to abandon his design.

Ptolemy Alexander, his younger brother, whom she had placed upon the throne in conjunction with herself, shocked by the barbarous cruelty with which she pursued his brother Lathyrus, especially in depriving him of his wife to give her to his enemy, and observing besides, that the greatest crimes cost her nothing, when the gratification of her ambition was concerned; that prince did not believe himself safe near her, and chose to abandon the throne, and retire; preferring a quiet life, without fear, in banishment, to reigning with so wicked and cruel a mother, with whom he was perpetually in danger. It was not without abundant solicitation he was prevailed upon to return ; for the people could not resolve that she should reign alone, though they well knew that she gave her son only the name of king ; that from the death of Physcon she had always engrossed the royal authority to herself ; and that the real cause of Lathyrius's disgrace, which had cost him his crown and wife, was his having presumed to act in one instance without her.

^e A. M. 3903. Ant. J. C. 101.

^f Justin. l. xxxix. c. 4

ε The death of Antiochus Grypus happened this year. He was assassinated by Heracleon, one of his own vassels, after having reigned twenty seven years. He left five sons ; Seleucus the eldest succeeded him ; the four others were Antiochus and Philip, twins ; Demetrius Eucharis, and Antiochus Dionysius. They were all kings in their turns, or at least pretended to the crown.

h Ptolemy Apion, son of Physcon, king of Egypt, to whom his father had given the kingdom of Cyrenaica, dying without issue, left his kingdom to the Romans by will, who, instead of taking advantage of that legacy, gave the cities their liberty, which soon filled the country with tyrants ; because the most powerful persons of each of those small states were for making themselves sovereigns of them. Lucullus, in passing that way against Mithridates, remedied those disorders in some measure ; but this was never ε A. M. 3907. Ant. J. C. 97.

h A. M. 3908. Ant. J. C. 96. Liv. Epit. l. lxx. Plut. in Lucul. p. 492. Justin. l. xxxix, c. 5.

properly effected, till the period when the country was reduced into the form of a Roman province.

ⁱ Antiochus the Cyzicenian siezed Antioch, after the death of Grypus, and used his utmost endeavours to dispossess Grypus's children of the rest of the kingdom; but Seleucus, who was in possession of many other good cities, maintained himself against him, and found means to support his right.

^k Tigranes, son of Tigranes king of Armenia, who had been kept in hostage by the Parthians during the life of his father, was released at his death, and set upon the throne, on condition that he should resign certain places to the Parthians. This happened twenty five years before he espoused the part of Mithridates against the Romans. I shall have occasion hereafter to speak of this Tigranes, and of the kingdom of Armenia.

^l The Cyzicenian, who saw that Seleucus strengthened himself every day in Syria, set out from Antioch to give him battle; but being defeated, and taken prisoner, he was put to death. Seleucus entered Antioch, and saw himself master of the whole empire of Syria; but did not keep it long. Antiochus Eusebes, son of the Cyzicenian, who made his escape from Antioch, when Seleucus took it, went to Aradus,^m where he caused himself to be crowned king. ⁿ From thence he marched with a considerable army against ⁱ A. M. 3909. Ant. J. C. 95. Porphyr. in Græc. Scal.

^k A. M. 3909. Ant. J. C. 95. Justin. l. xxxviii. c. 3. Appian. in Syr. p. 118. Strab. l. 11. p. 532.

^l A. M. 3910. Ant. J. C. 94. Joseph. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 25. Appian. in Syr. p. 132. Prophy. in Græc. Scal.

^m An island and city of Phenicia. ⁿ A. M. 3911. Ant. J. C. 93.

Seleucus, obtained a great victory over him, and obliged him to shut himself up in Mopsuestia, a city of Cilicia, and to abandon all the rest to the mercy of the victor. In this retirement he oppressed the inhabitants so much by the imposition of gross subsidies upon them, that at length they mutinied, invested the house where he resided, and set it on fire. Himself, and all who were in it, perished in the flames.

° Antiochus and Philip, the twin sons of Grypus, to revenge the death of their brother Seleucus, marched at the head of all the troops they could raise, against Mopsuestia. They took and demolished the city, and put all the inhabitants to the sword. But on their return, Eusebes charged them near the Orontes, and defeated them. Antiochus was drowned in endeavouring to swim his horse over that river. Philip made a fine retreat with a considerable body of men, which soon increased to such a number, as enabled him to keep the field, and dispute the empire with Eusebes.

The latter, to strengthen himself upon the throne, had married Selena the widow of Grypus. That politic princess, upon her husband's death, had found means to retain part of the empire, and had provided herself with good troops. Eusebes married her therefore for the augmentation of his forces. Lathyrus, from whom she had been taken, to avenge himself for that injury, sent to Cnidos for Demetrius Eucharis, the fourth son of Grypus, who was brought up in that place, and made him king at Damascus. Eusebes and Philip were too much employed against each other to prevent that blow; for though Eusebes had well retrieved his affairs, and augmented his power by his marriage, Philip however, still supported himself, and at last so totally defeated Eusebes in a great battle, that he was reduced to abandon his dominions, and take refuge among the Parthians, whose king at that time was Mithridates II. surnamed the Great. The empire of Syria by this means became divided between Philip and Demetrius.

Two years after, Eusebes, assisted by the Parthians, returned into Syria, repossessed himself of part of what he had before, and involved Philip in new difficulties. Another competitor fell also upon his hands, almost at the same time. This was Antiochus Dionysius, his brother, the fifth son of Grypus. He seized the city of Damascus, made himself king of Celosyria, and supported himself in it for three years.

¶ Affairs were neither more quiet, nor crimes and perfidy more rare in Egypt than in Syria. Cleopatra, not being able to suffer a companion in the supreme authority, nor to admit her son Alexander to share the honour of the throne with her, resolved to get rid of him, in order to reign alone for the future. That prince, who was apprized of her design, prevented her, and put her to death. She was a monster of a woman, who had spared neither mother, sons, nor daughters, and had sacrificed every thing to the ambitious desire of reigning. She was punished in this manner, for her crimes, but by a crime equal to her own.

¶ A. M. 3915. Ant. J. C. 89. Justin. l. xxxix. c. 4. Pausan. in Attic. p. 15. Athen. l. xii. p. 550.

I do not doubt, but the reader, as well as myself, is struck with horror at the sight of so dreadful a scene as our history has for some time exhibited. It furnishes us no where with such frequent and sudden revolutions, nor with examples of so many kings dethroned, betrayed, and murdered by their nearest relations, their brothers, sons, mothers, wives, friends, and confidants ; who, all in cold blood, with premeditated design, reflection, and concerted policy, employ the most odious and most inhuman means to those effects. Never was the anger of heaven more distinguished, or more dreadful, than upon these princes and people. We see here a sad complication of the blackest crimes, perfidy, imposture of heirs, divorces, poisoning, incest. Princes on a sudden become monsters, disputing treachery and wickedness with each other, attaining crowns with rapidity, and disappearing as soon ; reigning only to satiate their passions, and to render their people unhappy. Such a situation of a kingdom, wherein all orders of the state are in confusion, all laws despised, justice abolished, all crimes secure of impunity, denotes approaching ruin, and seems to call for it in the loudest manner.

As soon as it was known at Alexandria, that Alexander had caused his mother to be put to death, that horrid crime made the parricide so odious to his subjects, that they could not endure him any longer. They expelled him, and called in Lathyrus, whom they replaced upon the throne, in which he supported himself to his death. Alexander having collected some ships, endeavoured to return into Egypt the year following, but without success. He perished soon after in a new expedition which he undertook.

¶ The Syrians, weary of the continual wars made in their country by the princes of the house of Seleucus, for the sovereignty, and not being able to suffer any longer the ravages, murders, and other calamities, to which they were perpetually exposed, resolved at last to exclude them all, and to submit to a foreign prince, who might deliver them from the many evils those divisions occasioned, and restore the tranquillity of their country. Some had thoughts of Mithridates king of Pontus, others of Ptolemy king of Egypt ; but the former was actually engaged in a war with the Romans, and the other had always been the enemy of Syria. They therefore determined upon electing Tigranes, king of Armenia, and sent ambassadors to acquaint him with their resolution, and the choice they had made of him. He agreed to it, came to Syria, and took possession of the crown, which he wore eighteen years. He governed that kingdom fourteen years, by a viceroy named Megadates, whom he did not recal from that office, till he had occasion for him against the Romans.

Eusebes, being driven out of his dominions by his subjects and Tigranes, took refuge in Cilicia, where he passed the rest of his days in concealment and obscurity. As to Philip, it was not known what became of him. It is probable that he was killed in some action against Tigranes. Selena, the wife of Eusebes, retained Ptolemais, with part of Phenicia and Celosyria, and reigned there many years after, which enabled her to give her two sons an education worthy of their birth. The eldest was called Antiochus Asiaticus, and the youngest Seleucus Cybiosactes. I shall have occasion to speak of them in the sequel.

¶ A. M. 3921. Ant. J. C. 83. Justin. l. xl. c. 1 and 2. Appian in Syr. 118. p. Joseph. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 24.

Some time after Ptolemy Lathyrus had been replaced upon the throne of Egypt, a considerable rebellion broke out in the Upper Egypt. The rebels, being overthrown and defeated in a great battle, shut themselves up in the city of Thebes, where they defended themselves with incredible obstinacy. It was at length taken, after a siege of three years. Lathyrus used it with so much rigor, that from being the greatest and richest city till then in Egypt, it was almost reduced to nothing.

^r Lathyrus did not long survive the ruin of Thebes. To compute from the death of his father, he had reigned thirty six years ; eleven jointly with his mother in Egypt, eighteen in Cyprus, and seven alone in Egypt, after his mother's death. Cleopatra, his daughter, succeeded him, who was his only legitimate issue. Her proper name was Berenice ; but by the established custom of that house, all the sons were called Ptolemy, and the daughters Cleopatra.

Sylla, at that time perpetual dictator of Rome, sent Alexander to take possession of the crown of Egypt, after the death of his uncle Lathyrus, as the nearest heir male of the defunct. He was the son of that Alexander, who had put his mother to death. But the people of Alexandria had already set Cleopatra upon the throne, and she had been six months in possession of it when Alexander arrived. To accommodate the difference, and not to draw Sylla, the master of Rome, and in consequence, dispenser of law to the universe, upon their hands, it was agreed, that Cleopatra and he should marry, and reign jointly. But Alexander, who either did not approve of her for a wife, or would have no associate in the throne, caused her to be put to death nineteen days after their marriage, and reigned alone fifteen years. Murder and parricide were no longer reckoned as any thing in those times, and might be said to have grown into fashion among princes and princesses.

^r A. M. 3923. Ant. J. C. 81.

^s Soon after, Nicomedes king of Bithynia died, having first made the Roman people his heirs. His country by that means became a province of the Roman empire, as Cyrenaica also did the same year. The Romans, instead of appropriating the latter to themselves, had granted it liberty; twenty years had passed since, during which term, sedition and tyranny had occasioned infinite calamities. It is said, that the Jews, who had been long settled there, and composed a great part of the nation, contributed very much to those disorders. The Romans, to put a stop to them, were obliged to except Cyrenaica, which had been bequeathed to them by the last king's will, and to reduce it into a Roman province.

^s A. M. 3928. Ant. J. C. 76.

SECTION VII.

POMPEY DISPOSSESSES ANTIOCHUS ASIATICUS OF THE KINGDOM OF SYRIA. TROUBLES IN JUDEA AND EGYPT.

^r SOME troubles which happened in Egypt, occasioned by the disgust taken against Alexander, made Selena, the sister of Lathyrus, conceive thoughts of pretending to the crown. She sent her two sons, Antiochus Asiaticus, and Seleucus, whom she had by Antiochus Eusebes, to Rome, to solicit the senate in her behalf. The important affairs which employed Rome, at that time engaged in a war with Mithridates, and perhaps the motives of policy, from which he had always opposed the kings who were for joining the forces of Egypt with those of Syria, prevented the princes from obtaining what they demanded. After a residence of two years in Rome, and ineffectual solicitations, they set out upon their return into their own kingdom.

The eldest, called Antiochus, resolved to pass by the way of Sicily. He experienced an insult there, which is hardly credible, and shows how much Rome was corrupted in the times we speak of, to what excess the avarice of the magistrates sent into the provinces rose, and what horrid rapine they committed with impunity, in the sight and with the knowledge of the whole world.

Verres was at that time pretor in Sicily. As soon as he heard that Antiochus was arrived at Syracuse, as he had reason to believe, and had been told, that that prince had abundance of rare and precious things with him, he judged his arrival a kind of rich inheritance fallen to him. He began by sending Antiochus presents considerable enough, consisting in provisions of wine, oil, and corn. He then invited him to supper. The hall was magnificently adorned; the tables set off with all his vessels of the most excellent workmanship, of which he had a great number. The feast was sumptuous and delicate, for he had taken care that nothing should be wanting to make it so. In a word, the king withdrew, well convinced of the pretor's magnificence, and still better satisfied with the honourable reception he had given him.

^r A. M. 3931. Ant. J. C. 73. Cic. vi. in Ver. Orat. n. 61—67.

He invites Verres to supper in his turn; exposes all his riches, multitudes of silver vessels, and not a few cups of gold set with jewels, after the custom of kings, and especially those of Syria. There was among the rest a very large vessel for wine, made out of one precious stone. Verres takes each of these vessels into his hand, one after the other, praises and admires them; the king rejoices that the pretor of the Roman people is so well pleased with his entertainment.

From thenceforth the latter had no other thoughts than how to rifle Antiochus, and send him away fleeced and plundered of all his rich effects. He sent to desire that he would let him have the finest of the vessels he had seen at his house, under pretence of showing them to his workmen. The prince, who did not know Verres, complied without difficulty or suspicion. The pretor sent again, to desire that he would lend him the vessel made of a single precious stone, that he might consider it more exactly, as he said. The king sent him that also.

But to crown all ; the kings of Syria, of whom we speak, had carried a branch sconce with them to Rome, of singular beauty, as well from the precious stones with which it was adorned, as its exquisite workmanship. With this they intended to adorn the capitol, which had been burnt during the wars between Marius and Sylla, and was then rebuilding ; but that edifice not being finished, they would not leave it behind them, nor suffer any body to have a sight of it ; in order, that when it should appear at a proper time in the temple of Jupiter, the surprise might add to the admiration of it, and the charm of novelty give new splendour to the present. They therefore chose to carry it back into Syria, resolving to send ambassadors to offer this rare and magnificent gift, amongst many others, to the god, when they should know that his statue was set up in the temple.

Verres was informed of all this by some means or other ; for the prince had taken care to keep the sconce concealed ; not that he feared or suspected any thing, but that few people might see it, before exposed to the public view of the Romans. The pretor demanded it of the king, and earnestly begged him to send it him, expressing a great desire to examine it, and promising to let nobody else see it. The young prince, with the candour and simplicity of whose youth the noble sentiments of his birth were united, was far from suspecting any bad design. He ordered his officers to carry the sconce secretly to Verres, well covered from sight ; which was done accordingly. As soon as the wrappers were taken off, and the pretor beheld it, he cried out, this is a present worthy of a prince, worthy of a king of Syria, worthy of the capitol ; for it was amazingly splendid, from the quantity of fine jewels with which it was adorned, and the variety of the workmanship, in which art seemed to vie with the materials ; and at the same time of so large a size, that it was easy to distinguish, it was not intended to be used in the palaces of men, but to adorn a vast and superb temple.

The officers of Antiochus having given the pretor full time to consider it, prepared to carry it back, but were told by him, that he would examine it more at his leisure, and that his curiosity was not yet sufficiently gratified. He then bade them go home, and leave the sponce with him. They accordingly returned without it.

The king was not alarmed at first, and had no suspicion. One day, two days, several days passed, and the sponce was not brought home. The prince therefore sent to demand it of the pretor, who put it off till the next day ; but it was not returned then. At length, he applied in person to him, and prayed him to restore it. Who would believe it ? That very sponce, which he knew from the prince himself, was to be set up in the capitol, and designed for the great Jupiter, and the Roman people, Verres earnestly entreated the prince to give him. Antiochus excusing himself, both from the vow he had made to consecrate it to Jupiter, and the judgment which the many nations that had been concerned in the workmanship of it, and knew for whom it was designed, would pass upon such an action ; the pretor began to threaten him in the sharpest terms ; but when he saw his menaces had no more effect than his entreaties, he ordered the prince to quit his province before night, and alleged for his reason that he had received advice from good hands, that pirates of Syria were about to land in Sicily.

The king upon that withdrew to the public place ; and with tears in his eyes declared, with a loud voice, in a numerous assembly of the Syracusans, calling the gods and men to witness, that Verres had taken from him a scone of gold, enriched with precious stones, which was to have been placed in the capitol, to be a monument in that august temple of his alliance and amity with the Roman people. That he was not concerned, and did not complain, for the other vessels of gold and jewels which Verres had from him ; but that to see that scone taken from him by violence, was a misfortune and an affront, that made him inconsolable. That though by his own, and the intention of his brother, that scone was already consecrated to Jupiter, however he offered, presented, dedicated, and consecrated it again to that god, in the presence of the Roman citizens, who heard him, and called Jupiter to witness to the sentiments of his heart, and the piety of his intentions.

Antiochus Asiaticus, being returned into Asia, soon after ascended the throne ; he reigned over part of the country for the space of four years. ^u Pompey deprived him of his kingdom, during the war against Mithridates, and reduced Syria into a province of the Roman empire.

What thoughts could foreign nations conceive, and how odious ought the name of Roman to be to them, when they heard it told, that in a Roman province, a king had been so grossly injured by the pretor himself, a guest plundered, an ally and friend of the Roman people driven away with the highest indignity and violence ! And what Cicero reproaches Verres with, in this place, was not peculiar to him ; it was the crime of almost all the magistrates sent by Rome into the provinces ; a crime which the senate and people seemed to approve, and of which they made themselves equally guilty by their weak and abject connivance ; “ We have seen for several years,” says the same Cicero, in one of his orations against Verres, “ and have suffered in silence, the wealth of all nations to be transferred into the hands of a few private persons. Athens, Pergamus, Cyzicum, Miletus, Chio, Samos, in fine all Asia, Achaia, Greece, Sicily, are now inclosed in some of the country houses of those rich and unjust men of rapine, whilst money is universally a prodigious rarity every where else ; and we have just reason to believe, that ourselves connive in all these crying and terrible disorders ; as those who commit, take no manner of pains to conceal them, nor to hide their thefts and depredations from the eyes and knowledge of the public.”^v

^u A. M. 3939. Ant. J. C. 65.

Such was Rome at the time we now speak of, which soon occasioned its ruin, and the loss of its liberty. And, in my opinion to consider in this manner the failings and vices that prevail in a state, to examine their causes and effects, to enter thus into men’s most secret retirements, to use that expression, to study closely the characters and dispositions of those who govern, is a much more important part of history, than that which only treats of sieges, battles, and conquests ; to which however we must return.

^v Cic. in Ver. ult. de suppl. n. 125, 126.

The reign of Alexander Janneus in Judea, had always been involved in troubles, and seditions, occasioned by the powerful faction of the Pharisees, that continually opposed him, because he was not of a disposition to suffer himself to be rid by them.* His death did not put an end to those disorders. Alexandra, his wife, was appointed supreme administratrix of the nation, according to the king's last will. She caused her eldest son Hyrcanus to be acknowledged high priest. The Pharisees continually persisted in persecuting those who had been their enemies in the late reign. That princess, at her death, had appointed Hyrcanus her sole heir ; but Aristobulus, his younger brother, had the strongest party, and took his place.

* Nothing but troubles and violent agitations were to be seen on all sides. In Egypt, the Alexandrians weary of their king Alexander, took up arms and expelled him, and called in Ptolemy Auletes. He was a bastard of Lathyrus, who never had a legitimate son. He was surnamed Auletes, that is to say, " the player upon the flute," because he valued himself so much upon playing well upon that instrument, that he disputed the prize of it in the public games. Alexander being driven out in this manner, went to Pompey, who was then in the neighbourhood, to demand aid of him ;

† A. M. 3925. Ant. J. C. 79. Joseph. Antiq. xiii. 23, 24. et de bell. Judaic. i. 4. and A. M. 3934. Ant. J. C. 70.

* A. M. 3930. Ant. J. C. 65. Sueton. in. Jul. Cæs. c. xi. Trogus in. Prol. xxxix Appian. in Mithrid. p. 251.

Pompey would not interfere in his affairs, because they were foreign to his commission. That prince retired to Tyre, to wait there a more favourable conjuncture.

But none offered, and he died there some time after. Before his death he made a will, by which he declared the Roman people his heirs. The succession was important, and included all the dominions Alexander had possessed, and to which he had retained a lawful right, of which the violence he had sustained could not deprive him. The affair was taken into consideration by the senate. † Some were of opinion, that it was necessary to take possession of Egypt, and of the island of Cyprus, of which the testator had been sovereign, and which he had bequeathed in favour of the Roman people. The majority of the senators did not approve this advice. They had very lately taken possession of Bithynia, which had been left them by the will of Nicomedes, and of Cyrenaica and Lybia, which had been also given them by that of Apion; and they had reduced all those countries into Roman provinces. They were afraid, that if they also accepted Egypt and the isle of Cyprus, in virtue of a like donation, that their facility in accumulating provinces to provinces, might give too great umbrage, and express too clearly a design formed to engross in the same manner all other states. They believed besides, that this enterprise might involve them in another war, which would embarrass them very much, whilst they had that with Mithridates upon their hands; so that they contented themselves for the present with causing all the effects which Alexander had at his death, to be brought from Tyre, and did not meddle with the rest of his estates. This proceeding sufficiently implied, that they did not renounce the will, as the sequel will fully explain.

† Cic. Orat. ii. in Rullum, n. 41—43.

This is the fourth example of dominions left the Roman people by will ; a very singular custom, and almost unheard of in all other history, which undoubtedly does great honour to those in whose favour it was established. The usual methods of extending the bounds of a state, are war, victory, and conquest. But with what enormous injustice and violence are those methods attended, and how much devastation and blood, must it cost to subject a country by force of arms ? In this there is nothing cruel nor inhuman, and neither tears nor blood are shed. It is a pacific and legitimate increase of power, the simple acceptance of a voluntary gift. Subjection here has nothing of violence to enforce it, and proceeds from the heart.

There is another sort of violence, which has neither the name nor appearance of being so, but it is no less dangerous on that account, I mean seduction ; when to obtain the suffrages of a people, undermining arts, indirect means, secret collusions, and great donations of money, are employed to corrupt the fidelity of the persons of the highest credit and authority in states and kingdoms, and events are influenced, in which the principal agents act at a distance, and do not seem to have any share. In this we now speak of, there was no visible trace of a policy so common with princes, and which, far from making any scruple of it, they imagine for their glory.

Attalus, who was the first, if I am not mistaken, that appointed the Roman people his heirs, had not engaged in any strict union with that republic, during the short time he reigned. As for Ptolemy Apion, king of Cyrenaica, the Romans, far from using any arts to attain the succession to his dominions, renounced it, left the people in the full enjoyment of their liberty, and would not accept the inheritance afterwards, till they were in some measure obliged to it against their will. It does not appear that they were more solicitous either in public or private, with Nicomedes king of Bithynia, or Ptolemy Alexander king of Egypt.

What motives then induced these princes to act in this manner? First, gratitude; the house of Attalus was indebted for all its splendour to the Romans; Nicomedes had been defended by them against Mithridates; and next, love for their people, the desire of procuring a lasting tranquillity for them, and the idea they had of the wisdom, justice, and moderation of the Roman power. They died without children, or lawful successors; for bastards were not looked upon as such. They had only in view the future divisions and civil wars that might arise about the choice of a king, of which Egypt and Syria supplied them with dreadful examples. They saw with their own eyes the tranquillity and happiness enjoyed by many cities and nations under the protection of the Roman people.

A prince, in the situation of which we speak, had but three things to choose; either to leave his throne to the ambition of the grandes of his kingdom; to restore his subjects to their entire liberty, by instituting republican government ; or to give his kingdom to the Romans.

The first choice undoubtedly exposed the kingdom to all the horrors of a civil war, which the factions and jealousies of the great would not fail to excite, and continue with heat and fury ; and the prince's love for his subjects induced him to spare them misfortunes as fatal as inevitable.

The execution of the second choice was impracticable. There are many nations whose genius, manners, characters, and habit of living, do not admit their being formed into republics. They are not capable of that uniform equality, that dependence upon mute laws, that have not weight enough to enforce their obedience. They are made for monarchy, and every other kind of government is incompatible with the natural frame of their minds. Cyrenaica, which has a share in the present question, is a proof of this ; and all ages and climates supply us with examples of the same kind.

A prince, therefore, at his death, could not do more wisely than to leave his subjects the alliance and protection of a people, feared and respected by the whole universe, and therefore capable of defending them from the unjust and violent attempts of their neighbours. How many civil divisions and bloody discords did he spare them by this kind of testamentary disposition ? This appears from the example of Cyrenaica. The Romans out of a noble disinterestedness, having refused the gift the king had made them of it, at his death, that unhappy kingdom, abandoned to liberty and its own will, gave itself up to cabals and intrigues. Torn by a thousand factions, furious to madness against each other and, in a word, become like a ship without a pilot in the midst of the most violent storms, it suffered many years the most incredible calamities ; the only remedy of which was to pray, and in some manner to force, the Romans to vouchsafe to take the government of it upon themselves.

Besides this, a prince by such conduct did no more than prevent, and that advantageously for his people, what must necessarily have happened sooner or later. Was there any city or state capable of making head against the Romans ? Could it be expected that a kingdom, especially when the royal family was extinct, could support itself and its independence long against them ? There was an inevitable necessity for its falling into the hands of that people, and for that reason it was highly consistent with prudence to soften the yoke by a voluntary subjection ; for they made a great difference between the people who submitted to them freely, as to friends and protectors, and those who only yielded to them out of force, after a long and obstinate resistance, and being reduced, by reiterated defeats, to give way at last to a conqueror. We have seen with what severity the Macedonians, at least the principal persons of the nation, and after them the Achæans, were treated ; especially during the first years of their subjection.

The other nations suffered nothing of that kind ; and, generally speaking, of all foreign yokes, none ever was lighter than that of the Romans. Scarce could its weight be perceived by those who bore it. The subjection of Greece to the Roman empire, even under the emperors themselves, was rather a means to assure the public tranquillity, than a servitude heavy upon private persons, and prejudicial to society. Most of the cities were governed by their ancient laws, had always their own magistrates, and wanted very little of enjoying entire liberty. They were by that means secured from all the inconveniences and misfortunes of war with their neighbours, which had so long and so cruelly distressed the republics of Greece in the times of their ancestors; so that the Greeks seemed to be great gainers in ransoming themselves from these inconveniences, by some diminution of their liberty.

It is true, the provinces sometimes suffered very much from the avarice of governors; but those were only transient evils, which had no long effects, and to which the goodness and justice of a worthy successor applied a speedy redress, and which after all, were not comparable to the disorders with which the wars of the Athenians, Thebans, and Lacedemonians, against each other, were attended, and still less to the violences and ravages occasioned by the insatiable avarice and barbarous cruelty of the tyrants in many cities and states.

An evident proof of the wisdom of the princes, in leaving their dominions to the Romans after their death, is, that their people never exclaimed against that disposition, nor proceeded to any revolt of their own accord, to prevent its taking effect.

I do not pretend to excuse the Romans entirely in this place, nor to justify their conduct in all things. I have sufficiently observed the views of interest and political motives of their actions. I only say, that the Roman government, especially with regard to those who submitted voluntarily to them, was gentle, humane, equitable, advantageous to the people, and the source of their peace and tranquillity. There were indeed private oppressors, who made the Roman people authorize the most flagrant injustice, of which we shall soon see an example; but there was always a considerable number of citizens, zealous for the public good, who rose up against those violences, and declared loudly for justice. This happened in the affair of Cyprus, which it is now time to relate.

^z Clodius who commanded a small fleet near Cilicia, was defeated and taken prisoner by the pirates of that coast, against whom he had been sent. He caused Ptolemy, king of Cyprus, brother of Ptolemy Auletes, to be desired in his name to send him money to pay his ransom. That prince, who was a kind of prodigy in point of avarice, sent him only two talents. The pirates chose rather to release Clodius without ransom, than to take so small a one.

His thoughts were bent upon being revenged on that king as soon as possible. He had found means to get himself elected tribune of the people; an important office, which gave him great power. Clodius made use of it for the destruction of his enemy. He pretended that prince had no right to the kingdom of Cyprus, which had been left to the Roman people by the will of Alexander, who died at Tyre. It was determined, in consequence, that the kingdom of Egypt, and that of Cyprus, which depended on it, appertained to the Romans, in virtue of that donation ; and Clodius accordingly obtained an order of the people to seize the kingdom of Cyprus, to depose Ptolemy, and to confiscate all his effects. To put so unjust an order in execution, he had credit and address enough to have the justest of the Romans elected ; I mean Cato,^a whom he removed from the republic, under the pretext of an honourable commission, that he might not find him an obstacle to the violent and criminal designs he meditated. Cato was therefore sent into the isle of Cyprus, to deprive a prince of his kingdom, who well deserved that affront, says an historian, for his many irregularities ; as if a man's vices sufficiently authorized the seizing all his fortunes.

^z A. M. 3946. Ant. J. C. 58. Strab. l. iv. p. 684.

Cato, upon his arrival at Rhodes, sent to bid Ptolemy retire peaceably, and promised him, if he complied, to procure him the high priesthood of the temple of Venus, at Paphos, the revenues of which were sufficiently considerable for his honourable subsistence. Ptolemy rejected that proposal. He was not, however, in a condition to defend himself against the power of the Romans ; but could not resolve, after having worn a crown so long, to live as a private person. Determined therefore to end his life and reign together, he embarked with all his treasures, and put to sea. His design was to have holes bored in the bottom of his ship, that it might sink with him and all his riches. But when he came to the execution of his purpose, though he persisted constantly in the resolution of dying himself, he had not the courage to include his innocent and well beloved treasures in his ruin ; and thereby showed that he loved them better than he did himself, by title, king of Cyprus, but in fact the mean slave of his money. He returned to shore, and replaced his gold in his magazines, after which he poisoned himself, and left the whole to his enemies. Cato carried those treasures, the following year to Rome. The sum was so large that in the greatest triumphs the like had scarce been laid up in the public treasury. Plutarch makes it amount to almost seven thousand talents, one million, fifty thousand pounds, sterling. Cato caused all Ptolemy's precious effects and moveables to be sold publicly ; reserving only to himself a picture of Zeno, the founder of the Stoics, the sentiments of which sect he followed.

^a Plut. in Cat. p. 776.

The Roman people here take off the mask, and show themselves, not such as they had been in the glorious ages of the republic, full of contempt for riches, and esteem for poverty, but as they were become, after gold and silver had entered Rome in triumph with their victorious generals. Never was any thing more capable of disgracing and reproaching the Romans than this last action. " The Roman people," says Cicero, " instead of making it their honour, and almost a duty, as formerly, to reestablish the kings, their enemies, whom they had conquered, upon their thrones, now see a king, their ally, or at least a constant friend to the republic, who had never done them any wrong, of whom neither the senate nor any of our generals had ever the least complaint, who enjoyed the dominions left him by his ancestors in tranquillity, plundered on a sudden, without any formality, and all his effects sold by auction almost before his eyes, by order of the same Rôman people. This," continues Cicero, "shows other kings upon what they are to rely for their security; from this fatal example they learn, that amongst us there needs only the secret intrigue of some seditious tribune, for depriving them of their thrones, and plundering them at the same time, of all their fortunes."^b

What I am most amazed at is; that Cato, the justest and most upright man of those times, but what was the most shining virtue and justice of the pagans! should lend his name and service in so notorious an injustice. Cicero, who had reasons for sparing him, and dared not blame his conduct openly, shows, however, in the same discourse I have now cited, but in an artful and delicate manner, and by way of excusing him, how much he had dishonoured himself by that action.

During Cato's stay at Rhodes, Ptolemy Auletes, king of Egypt, and brother to him of Cyprus, came thither to him. I reserve for the following book the history of that prince, which merits a particular attention.

^b Cic. Orat. pro. Sexto. n. 57.

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO
DEPARTMENT OF CHEMISTRY

REPORT OF THE
COMMISSIONERS OF THE LAND OFFICE

ALABAMA
1898

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO
DEPARTMENT OF CHEMISTRY

REPORT OF THE
COMMISSIONERS OF THE
LAND OFFICE

ALABAMA
1898

BOOK TWENTIETH.

THE

HISTORY

OF

ALEXANDER'S SUCCESSORS,

CONTINUED.

ARTICLE I.

ABRIDGMENT OF THE HISTORY OF THE JEWS, FROM ARISTOBULUS TO HEROD THE IDUMEAN.

AS the history of the Jews is often intermixed with that of the kings of Syria and Egypt, I have taken care, as occasion offered, to relate of it what was most necessary and suitable to my subject. I shall add here what remains of that history to the reign of Herod the Great. The historian Josephus, who is in every one's hands, will satisfy the curiosity of such as are desirous of being more fully informed of it. Dean Prideaux, whom I have used here, may be also consulted to the same effect.

SECTION I.

REIGN OF ARISTOBULUS I. WHICH LASTED TWO YEARS.

^a HYRCANUS, high priest and prince of the Jews, had left five sons at his death. The first was Aristobulus, the second Antigonus, the third Alexander Janneus; the fourth's name is unknown. The fifth was called Absalom.

Aristobulus, as the eldest, succeeded his father in the high priesthood and temporal sovereignty. As soon as he saw himself well established, he assumed the diadem and title of king, which none of those who had governed Judea from the Babylonish captivity, had done besides himself. The conjuncture seemed favourable for that design. The kings of Syria and Egypt, who were alone capable of opposing it, were weak princes, involved in domestic troubles and civil wars, little secure upon the throne, and not maintaining themselves long in the possession of it. He knew the Romans were much inclined to authorize the dismembering and dividing the dominions of the Grecian kings, in order to weaken and keep them low in comparison to themselves. Besides, it was natural for Aristobulus to take the advantage of the victories and acquisitions made by his ancestors, who had given an assured and uninterrupted establishment to the Jewish nation, and enabled it to support the dignity of a king amongst its neighbours.

^a A. M. 3898. Ant. J. C. 106. Joseph. Antiq. xiii. 19, &c. Id. de Bell. Jud. 1. 3.

Aristobulus's mother, in virtue of Hyrcanus's will, pretended to the government ; but Aristobulus was the strongest, and put her in prison, where he caused her to be starved to death. For his brothers, as he very much loved Antigonus the eldest of them, he gave him at first a share in the government ; but some small time after, upon a false accusation, put him to death. He confined the other three in prison during his life.

^b When Aristobulus had fully possessed himself of the authority his father had enjoyed, he entered into a war with the Itureans, and after having subjected the greatest part of them, he obliged them to embrace Judaism, as Hyrcanus had the Idumeans some years before. He gave them the alternative, either to be circumcised and profess the Jewish religion, or to quit their country, and seek a settlement elsewhere. They chose to stay and comply with what was required of them, and were incorporated with the Jews, both as to spirituals and temporals. This practice became a fundamental maxim with the Asmoneans. It shows that they had not a just idea of religion at that time, which does not impose itself by force, and which ought not to be received but voluntarily and by persuasion. Iturea, inhabited by the people in question, was a part of Celosyria, on the north east frontier of Israel, between the inheritance of the half tribe of Manasseh, on the other side of the Jordan, and the territory of Damascus.

A distemper obliged Aristobulus to return from Iturea to Jerusalem, and to leave the command of the army to his brother Antigonus, to make an end of the war he had begun. The queen and her cabal, who envied Antigonus the king's favour, took the advantage of his illness, to alienate the king against him by false reports and vile calumnies. Antigonus soon returned to Jerusalem, after the successes by which he had terminated the war. His entry was a kind of triumph. The feast of the tabernacles was then celebrating. He went directly to the temple with his guards, completely armed as he had entered the city, without giving himself time to change any part of his equipage. This was made a crime with the king; who, otherwise prejudiced against him, sent him orders to disarm himself, and come to him as soon as possible; conceiving, if he refused to obey, it was a proof of some bad design; and in that case he gave orders that he should be killed. The person sent by Aristobulus was gained by the queen and her cabal, and told him the order quite differently; that the king desired to see him completely armed as he was. Antigonus went directly to wait on him; and the guards who saw him come in his arms, obeyed their orders, and killed him.

^b A. M. 3898. Ant. J. C. 106. Joseph. Anfiq. xiii. 19. Id. de Bell. Jud. 1.3.

Aristobulus, having discovered all that had passed, was violently affected with it, and inconsolable for his death. Tormented with remorse of conscience for this murder, and that of his mother, he led a miserable life, and expired at last in the highest grief and despair.

SECTION II.

REIGN OF ALEXANDER JANNEUS, WHICH CONTINUED TWENTY SEVEN YEARS.

° SALOME, the wife of Aristobulus, immediately after his death, took the three princes out of the prison, into which they had been put by her husband. Alexander Janneus, the eldest of the three, was crowned. He put his next brother to death, who had endeavoured to deprive him of the crown. As for the third, named Absalom, who was of a peaceable disposition, and who had no thoughts but of living in tranquillity as a private person,^d he granted him his favour, and protected him during his whole life. No more is said of him, than that he gave his daughter in marriage to the youngest son of his brother Alexander, and that he served him against the Romans at the siege of Jerusalem, in which he was made prisoner, forty two years after, when the temple was taken by Pompey.

Whilst all this passed, the two kings of Syria, of whom Grypus reigned at Antioch, and Antiochus of Cyzicum at Damascus, made a cruel war upon each other, although they were brothers. Cleopatra, and Alexander the youngest of her sons, reigned in Egypt, and Ptolemy Lathyrus the eldest, in Cyprus.

Alexander Janneus, some time after he returned to Jerusalem, and had taken possession of the throne, had set a good army on foot, which passed the Jordan, and formed the siege of Gadara. At the end of ten months, having made himself master of that city, he took several other very strong places, situated on the other side of the Jordan ; but not being sufficiently upon his guard in his return, he was beat by the enemy, and lost ten thousand men, with all the spoils he had taken, and his own baggage. He returned to Jerusalem in the highest affliction for this loss, and the shame with which it was attended. He had even the mortification to see, that many people, instead of lamenting his misfortune, took a malignant joy in it ; for, from the quarrel of Hyrcanus with the Pharisees, they had always been the enemies of his house, and especially of this Alexander ; and, as they had drawn almost the whole people into their party, they had so strongly prejudiced and inflamed them against him, that all the disorders and commotions, with which his whole reign was embroiled, flowed from this source.

° A. M. 3899. Ant. J. C. 105. Joseph. Antiq. xiii. 20. Id. de Bell. Jud. 1. 3.

^d Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 8.

° This loss, great as it was, did not prevent his going to seize Raphia and Anthedon, when he saw the coast of Gaza without defence, after the departure of Lathyrus. Those two posts, that were only a few miles from Gaza, keep it in a manner blocked up, which was what he proposed when he attacked them. He had never forgiven the inhabitants of Gaza, for calling in Lathyrus against him, and giving him troops, which had contributed to his gaining the fatal battle of Jordan, and he earnestly sought all occasions to avenge himself upon them.

† As soon as his affairs would permit, he came with a numerous army to besiege the city. Apollodorus, the governor of it, defended the place a whole year with a valor and prudence that acquired him great reputation. ^g His own brother Lysimachus could not see his glory without envy ; and that base passion induced him to assassinate the governor. That wretch afterwards associated with some others as bad as himself, and surrendered the city to Alexander. Upon his entrance, it was thought by his behaviour and the orders he gave, that he intended to use his victory with clemency and moderation. But as soon as he saw himself master of all the posts, and that there was nothing to oppose him, he gave his soldiers permission to kill, plunder and destroy ; and immediately all the barbarity that could be imagined was exercised upon that unfortunate city. The pleasure of revenge cost him very dear ; for the inhabitants of Gaza defended themselves like men in despair, and killed almost as many of his people as they were themselves. But at length, he satiated his brutal revenge, and reduced that ancient and famous city to an heap of ruins ; after which he returned to Jerusalem. This war employed him a year.

° A. M. 3904. Ant. J. C. 100.

† A. M. 3906. Ant. J. C. 98.

^h Some time after the people affronted him in the most heinous manner. At the feast of the tabernacles, whilst he was in the temple, offering a solemn sacrifice, in quality of high priest, upon the altar of burnt offerings, they threw lemons at his head, calling him a thousand injurious names, and amongst the rest giving him that of slave ; a reproach, which sufficiently argued, that they looked upon him as unworthy of the crown and pontificate. This was an effect of what Eleazar had presumed to advance; that the mother of Hyrcanus had been a captive. These indignities enraged Alexander to such a degree, that he attacked those insolent people in person, at the head of his guards, and killed to the number of six thousand of them. Seeing how much the Jews were disaffected in regard to him, he was afraid to trust his person any longer to them, and used foreign troops for his guard, whom he caused to come from Pisidia and Cilicia. Of these he formed a body of six thousand men, who attended him every where.

^g A. M. 3907. Ant. J. C. 97.

^e A. M. 3909. Ant. J. C. 95. Joseph. Antiq. xiii. 21;

ⁱ When Alexander saw the storm which had rose against him a little appeased by the terror of the revenge he had taken for it, he turned his arms against the enemy abroad. After having obtained some advantages over them, he fell into an ambuscade, wherein he lost the greatest part of his army, and escaped himself with great difficulty. At his return to Jerusalem,^k the Jews, incensed at his defeat, revolted against him. They flattered themselves, that they should find him so much weakened and dejected by his loss, that they should find no difficulty in completing his destruction, which they had long desired. Alexander, who wanted neither application nor valor, and who, besides, had a more than common capacity, soon found troops to oppose them. A civil war ensued between him and his subjects, which continued six years, and occasioned great misfortunes to both parties. The rebels were beaten and defeated upon many occasions.

^l Alexander having taken a city wherein many of them had shut themselves up, carried eight hundred of them to Jerusalem, and caused them all to be crucified in one day. When they were fixed to the cross, he ordered their wives and children to be brought out, and to have their throats cut before their faces. During this cruel execution, the king regaled his wives and concubines in a place from whence they saw all that passed ; and this sight was to him and them the principal part of the entertainment. Horrid gratification ! This civil war, during the six years that it lasted, had cost the lives of more than fifty thousand men on the side of the rebels.

ⁱ A. M. 3910. Ant. J. C. 94.

^k A. M. 3912. Ant. J. C. 92.

^l A. M. 3918. Ant. J. C. 86.

Alexander, after having put an end to it, undertook many other foreign expeditions with very great success. Upon his return to Jerusalem, he abandoned himself to intemperance and excess of wine, that brought a quartan ague upon him,^m of which he died at three years end, after having reigned twenty seven.

He left two sons, Hyrcanus and Aristobulus ; but he decreed by his will, that Alexandra, his wife, should govern the kingdom during her life, and choose which of her sons she thought fit to succeed her.

^m A. M. 3925. Ant. J. C. 79.

SECTION III.

REIGN OF ALEXANDRA, THE WIFE OF ALEXANDER JANNEUS, WHICH CONTINUED NINE YEARS.

ⁿ ACCORDING to the advice of her husband, Alexandra submitted herself and her children to the power of the Pharisees, declaring to them, that in doing so, she only conformed to the last will of her husband.

By this step she gained so much upon them, that forgetting their hatred for the dead, though they carried it during his life as far as possible, they changed it on a sudden into a respect and veneration for his memory ; and, instead of the invectives and reproaches they had always abundantly vented against him, nothing was heard but praises and panegyrics, wherein they exalted immoderately the great actions of Alexander, by which the nation had been aggrandized, and its power, honour and credit, much augmented. By this means they brought over the people so effectually, whom, till then, they had always irritated against him, that they celebrated his funeral with greater pomp and magnificence than that of any of his predecessors ; and Alexandra, according to the intent of his will, was confirmed sovereign administratrix of the nation. We see from hence, that a blind and unlimited conformity to the power and will of the Pharisees stood with them for every kind of merit, and made all failings, and even crimes, disappear as effectually as if they had never been ; which is very common with those who are fond of ruling.

ⁿ A. M. 3926. Ant. J. C. 78. Joseph. Antiq. xiii. 23, 24, et de Bell. Jud. i. 4.

When that princess saw herself well established, she caused her eldest son, Hrycanus, to be received as high priest; he was then near thirty years of age. According to her promise, she gave the administration of all important affairs to the Pharisees. The first thing they did was to repeal the decree, by which John Hyrcanus, father of the two last kings, had abolished all their traditional constitutions, which were afterwards more generally received than ever. They persecuted with great cruelty, all those who had declared themselves their enemies in the preceding reigns, without the queen's being able to prevent them; because she had tied up her own hands, by putting herself into those of the Pharisees. She had seen in her husband's time what a civil war was, and the infinite misfortunes with which it is attended. She was afraid of kindling a new one; and, not knowing any other means to prevent it, than to give way to the violence of those revengeful and inexorable men, she believed it necessary to suffer a less, by way of precaution against a greater evil.

What we have said upon this head may contribute very much to our having a right sense of the state of the Jewish nation, and of the characters of those who governed it.

° The Pharisees always continued their persecutions against those who had opposed them, under the late king. They made them accountable for all the faults and cruelties with which they had thought proper to blacken his memory. They had already got rid of many of their enemies, and invented every day new articles of accusation to destroy those who gave them most umbrage among such as still survived.

° A. M. 3931. Ant. J. C. 73. Joseph. Antiq. xiii, 24. et de Bell. Jūd. i. 4.

The friends and partizans of the late king, seeing no end to these persecutions, and that their destruction was sworn, assembled at last, and came in a body to wait on the queen, with Aristobulus, her second son, at their head. They represented to her the services they had done the late king ; their fidelity and attachment to him in all his wars, and in all the difficulties with which he had been involved during the troubles ; that it was very hard at present, under her government, that every thing they had done for him should be made criminal, and to see themselves sacrificed to the implacable hatred of their enemies, solely for their adherence to herself and her family. They implored her either to put a stop to such sort of inquiries, or, if that was not in her power, to permit them to retire out of the country, in order to their seeking an asylum elsewhere ; at least they begged her to put them into garrisoned places, where they might find some security against the violence of their enemies.

The queen was as much affected as it was possible to be with the condition she saw them in, and the injustice done them ; but it was out of her power to do for them all she desired, for she had given herself masters, by engaging to act in nothing without the consent of the Pharisees. How dangerous is it to invest such people with too much authority ! They exclaimed, that it would be putting a stop to the course of justice, to suspend the inquiries after the culpable ; that such a proceeding was what no government ought to suffer ; and that therefore they would never come into it. On the other side, the queen believed, that she ought not to give her consent that the real and faithful friends of her family should abandon their country in such a manner ; because she would then lie at the mercy of a turbulent faction without any support, and would have no resource in case of necessity. She resolved therefore upon the third point they had proposed to her, and dispersed them into the places where she had garrisons. She found two advantages in that conduct ; the first was, that their enemies dared not attack them in those fortresses, where they would have their arms in their hands ; and the second, that they would always be a body of reserve, upon which she could rely upon occasion in case of any rupture.

Some years after, queen Alexandra fell sick of a very dangerous distemper, which brought her to the point of death.^p As soon as Aristobulus, her youngest son, saw that she could not recover, as he had long formed the design of seizing the crown at her death, he stole out of Jerusalem in the night, with only one domestic, and went to the places in which, according to a plan he had given of them, the friends of his father had been placed in garrison. He was received in them with open arms, and in fifteen days time twenty two of those towns and castles declared for him, which put him in possession of almost all the forces of the state. The people, as well as the army, were entirely inclined to declare for him, weary of the cruel administration of the Pharisees, who had governed without control under Alexandra, and were become insupportable to all the world. They came therefore in crowds from all sides to follow the standard of Aristobulus; in hopes that he would abolish the tyranny of the Pharisees, which could not be expected from Hyrcanus his brother, who had been brought up by his mother in a blind submission to that sect; besides which, he had neither the courage nor capacity necessary to so vigorous a design; for he was heavy and indolent, void of activity and application, and of a very mean genius.

^p A. M. 3934. Ant. J. C. 70.

When the Pharisees saw that Aristobulus's party augmented considerably, they went with Hyrcanus at their head to represent to the dying queen what had passed, and to demand her orders and assistance. She answered, that she was no longer in a condition to intermeddle with such affairs, and that she left the care of them to the Pharisees. However she appointed Hyrcanus her heir general, and expired soon after.

As soon as she was dead, he took possession of the throne, and the Pharisees used all their endeavours to support him upon it. When Aristobulus quitted Jerusalem, they caused his wife and children, whom he had left behind him, to be shut up in the castle or Baris^a as hostages against himself. But seeing this did not stop him, they raised an army. Aristobulus did the same. A battle near Jericho decided the quarrel. Hyrcanus, abandoned by most part of the troops, who went over to his brother, was obliged to fly to ^a Baris was a castle situate upon a high rock, without the works of the temple, which were upon the same rock.

Jerusalem, and to shut himself up in the castle of Baris ; his partisans took refuge in the temple. Some time after, they also submitted to Aristobulus, and Hyrcanus was obliged to come to an accommodation with him.

SECTION IV.

REIGN OF ARISTOBULUS II. WHICH CONTINUED SIX YEARS.

IT was agreed by the accommodation, that Aristobulus should have the crown and high priesthood, and that Hyrcanus should resign both to him, and content himself with a private life, under the protection of his brother, and with the enjoyment of his fortune. It was not difficult to reconcile him to this ; for he loved quiet and ease above all things, and quitted the government, after having possessed it three months. The tyranny of the Pharisees ended with his reign, after having greatly distressed the Jewish nation from the death of Alexander Janneus.

The troubles of the state were not so soon appeased, to which the ambition of Antipas, better known under the name of Antipater, father of Herod, gave birth. He was by extraction an Idumean, and a Jew by religion, as were all the Idumeans, from the time Hyrcanus had obliged them to embrace Judaism. As he had been brought up in the court of Alexander Janneus, and of Alexandra his wife, who reigned after him, he had gained the ascendant of Hyrcanus their eldest son, with the hope of raising himself by his favour, when he should succeed to the crown.^s But when he saw all his measures broke by the deposition of Hyrcanus, and the coronation of Aristobulus, from whom he had nothing to expect, he employed his whole address and application to replace Hyrcanus upon the throne.

^r A. M. 3935. Ant. J. C. 69. Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 2—8. et de Bell. Jud. 1—5.

The latter, by his secret negotiations, had at first applied to Aretas, king of Arabia Petrea, for aid to reinstate himself. After various events which I pass over to avoid prolixity, he had recourse to Pompey, who, on his return from his expedition against Mithridates, was arrived in Syria.^t He there took cognizance of the competition between Hyrcanus and Aristobulus, who repaired thither according to his orders. A great number of Jews went thither also, to demand that they should be freed from the government of both the one and the other. They represented, that they ought not to be ruled by kings; that they had long been accustomed to obey only the high priest, who, without any other title, administered justice according to the laws and constitutions transmitted down to them from their forefathers; that the two brothers were indeed of the sacerdotal line; but, that they had changed the form of the government for a new one, which would enslave them, if not remedied.

Hyrcanus complained, that Aristobulus had unjustly deprived him of his birth right, by usurping every thing, and leaving him only a small estate for his subsistence. He accused him also of practising piracy at sea, and of plundering his neighbours by land. And to confirm what he alleged against him, he produced almost a thousand Jews, the principals of the nation, whom Antipater had brought expressly to support, by their testimony, what that prince had to say against his brother.

^s A. M. 3939. Ant. J. C. 65. Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 2—8. et de Bell. Jud. 1—5.

^t Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 5. Id. de Bell. Jud. 1—5.

Aristobulus replied to this, that Hyrcanus had been deposed only for his incapacity ; that his sloth and indolence rendered him entirely incapable of the public affairs ; that the people despised him, and that he, Aristobulus, had been obliged to take the reins of the government into his own hands, to prevent them from falling into those of strangers. In fine, that he bore no other title than his father Alexander had done before him. And in proof of what he advanced, he produced a great number of the young nobility of the country, who appeared with all possible splendour and magnificence. Their superb habits, haughty manners, and proud demeanor, did no great service to his cause.

Pompey heard enough to discern, that the conduct of Aristobulus was violent and unjust, but would not however pronounce immediately upon it, lest Aristobulus, out of resentment, should oppose his designs against Arabia, which he had much at heart ; he therefore dismissed the two brothers respectfully, and told them, that at his return from reducing Aretas and his Arabians, he should pass through Judea, and that he would then regulate their affairs, and make the necessary dispositions in all things.

Aristobulus, who fully penetrated Pompey's sentiments, set out suddenly from Damascus, without paying him the least instance of respect, returned into Judea, armed his subjects, and prepared for a good defence. By this conduct, he made Pompey his mortal enemy.

Pompey applied himself also in making preparations for the Arabian war. Aretas, till then, had despised the Roman arms ; but when he saw them at his door, and that victorious army ready to enter his dominions, he sent an embassy to make his submissions. Pompey, however, advanced as far as Petra, his capital, which he took. Aretas was taken in it. Pompey at first kept him under a guard ; but at length he was released upon accepting the conditions imposed on him by the victor, who soon after returned to Damascus.

He was not apprized till then of Aristobulus's proceedings in Judea. He marched thither with his army, and found Aristobulus posted in the castle of Alexandrion, which stood upon a high mountain at the entrance of the country. The place was extremely strong, built by his father Alexander, who had given his name to it. Pompey sent to bid him come down to him. Aristobulus was not much inclined to comply, but he at last gave in to the opinion of those about him, who apprehending a war with the Romans, advised him to go. He did so, and after a conversation which turned upon his difference with his brother, he returned into his castle. He repeated the same two or three times, in hopes by that complacency to gain upon Pompey, and induce him to decide in his favour. But for fear of accident, he did not omit to put good garrisons into his strong places, and to make all other preparations for a vigorous defence, in case Pompey should decree against him. Pompey, who had advice of his proceedings, the last time he came to him, obliged him to put them all into his hands, by way of sequestration, and made him sign orders for that purpose to all the commanders of those places.

Aristobulus, incensed at the violence which had been done him, as soon as he was released, made all haste to Jerusalem, and prepared every thing for the war. His resolution to keep the crown, made him the sport of the different passions, hope and fear. When he saw the least appearance that Pompey would decide in his favour, he made use of all the arts of complacency to incline him to it. When on the contrary he had the least reason to suspect, that he would declare against him, he observed a directly opposite conduct. Such was the contrariety, visible in the different steps he took throughout this affair.

Pompey followed him close. The first place, where he encamped in his way to Jerusalem, was Jericho ; there he received the news of Mithridates's death, as we shall see in the following book.

He continued his march towards Jerusalem. When he approached, Aristobulus, who began to repent of what he had done, came out to meet him, and endeavoured to bring him to an accommodation, by promising an entire submission, and a great sum of money to prevent the war. Pompey accepted his offers, and sent Gabinius, at the head of a detachment, to receive the money ; but when that lieutenant general arrived at Jerusalem, he found the gates shut against him, and, instead of receiving the money, he was told from the top of the walls, that the city would not stand to the agreement. Pompey thereupon, not being willing that they should deceive him with impunity, ordered Aristobulus, whom he had kept with him, to be put in irons, and advanced with his whole army against Jerusalem. The city was extremely strong by its situation, and the works which had been made; and had it not been divided within doors against itself, was capable of making a long defence.

Aristobulus's party was for defending the place, especially when they saw that Pompey kept their king prisoner; but the adherents of Hyrcanus were determined to open the gates to that general; and as the latter were much the greater number, the other party retired to the mountain where the temple stood, to defend it, and caused the bridges of the ditch and valley, which surrounded it, to be broke down. Pompey, to whom the city immediately opened its gates, resolved to besiege the temple. The place held out three months entire, and would have done so three months more, and perhaps obliged the Romans to abandon their enterprise, but for the superstitious rigor with which the besieged observed the sabbath. They believed, indeed, that they might defend themselves when attacked, but not that they might prevent the works of the enemy, or make any for themselves. The Romans knew how to take the advantage of this inaction upon the sabbath days. They did not attack the Jews upon them, but filled up the fosses, made their approaches, and fixed their engines without opposition. They threw down at length a great tower, with which so great a part of the wall fell, that the breach was large enough for an assault. The place was carried sword in hand, and a terrible slaughter ensued, in which more than twelve thousand persons were killed.

During the whole tumult, cries and disorder, of this slaughter, history observes that the priests, who were at that time employed in divine service, continued it with surprising unconcern, notwithstanding the rage of their enemies, and their grief to see their friends and relations massacred before their eyes. Many of them saw their own blood mingle with that of the sacrifices they offered, and the sword of the enemy make themselves the victims of their duty; happy, and worthy of being envied, if they were as faithful to the spirit as the letter of it.

Pompey, with many of his superior officers, entered the temple, and not only into the sanctuary, but into the Sanctum Sanctorum, into which, by the law, only the high priest was permitted to enter once a year, upon the solemn day of expiation. This was what afflicted and enraged the Jews most against the Romans.

Pompey did not touch the treasures of the temple, that consisted principally in sums which had been deposited there by private families for their better security. Those sums amounted to two thousand talents,^u in specie, without reckoning the gold and silver vessels, which were innumerable, and of infinite value. It was not, says Cicero, out of respect for the majesty of the god adored in that temple, that Pompey behaved in this manner ; for, according to him, nothing was more contemptible than the Jewish religion, more unworthy the wisdom and grandeur of the Romans, nor more opposite to the institutions of their ancestors. Pompey in this noble disinterestedness had no other motive than to deprive malice and calumny of all means of attacking his reputation. Such were the thoughts of the most learned of the pagans upon the only religion of the true God. They blasphemed what they knew nothing of.

^u Three hundred thousand pounds sterling.

It hath been observed, that till then, Pompey had been successful in all things, but that after this sacrilegious curiosity, his good fortune abandoned him, and that his taking the temple of Jerusalem was his last victory.

SECTION V.

REIGN OF HYRCANUS II. WHICH CONTINUED TWENTY FOUR YEARS.

▼ POMPEY, having put an end to the war caused the walls of Jerusalem to be demolished, reestablished Hyrcanus, and sent Aristobulus, with his two sons, Alexander and Antigonus, prisoners to Rome. He dismembered several cities from the kingdom of Judea, which he united with the government of Syria, imposed a tribute upon Hyrcanus, and left the administration of affairs to Antipater, who was at the court of Hyrcanus, and one of his principal ministers.

Alexander made his escape upon the way to Rome, and returned into Judea, where he afterwards excited new troubles.

¶ Hyrcanus finding himself too weak to take the field against him, had recourse to the arms of the Romans. Gabinius, governor of Syria, after having overthrown Alexander in a battle, went to Jerusalem, and reinstated Hyrcanus in the high priesthood.* He made great alterations in the civil government; for, from monarchical, as it had been, he changed it into aristocratical; but those innovations were but of short duration.

‡ Crassus, upon his march against the Parthians, always intent upon gratifying his insatiable avarice, stopped at Jerusalem, where he had been told great treasures were laid up. He plundered the temple of all the riches in it, which amounted to the sum of ten thousand talents, that is to say, about one million five hundred thousand pounds sterling.

‡ Cesar, after his expedition into Egypt, being arrived in Syria, Antigonus, who had made his escape from Rome with his father Aristobulus, came to throw himself at his feet, begged him to reestablish him upon the throne of his father, who was lately dead, and made great complaints against Antipater and Hyrcanus. Cesar had too great obligations to both, to do any thing contrary to their interests; for,

¶ A. M. 3947. Ant. J. C. 57.

* Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 10. Id. de Bell. Jud. 1. 6.

‡ A. M. 3950. Ant. J. C. 54.

‡ A. M. 3957. Ant. J. C. 47. Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 15. de Bell. Jud. i. 8.

as we shall see in the sequel, without the aid he had received from them, his expedition into Egypt would have miscarried. He decreed, that Hyrcanus should retain the dignity of high priest of Jerusalem, and the sovereignty of Judea, to himself and his posterity after him for ever, and gave Antipater the office of procurator of Judea, under Hyrcanus. By this decree, the aristocracy of Gabinius was abolished, and the government of Judea reestablished upon the ancient footing.

^a Antipater caused the government of Jerusalem to be given to Phasaël his eldest son, and that of Galilee to Herod, his second son.

^b Cesar, at Hyrcanus's request, and in consideration of the services he had rendered him in Egypt and Syria, permitted him to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem, which Pompey had caused to be demolished. Antipater, without losing time, began the work, and the city was soon fortified as it had been before the demolition. Cesar was killed this year.

During the civil wars, Judea, as well as all the other provinces of the Roman empire, was agitated by violent troubles.

^c Pacorus, son of Orodes, king of Parthia, had entered Syria, with a powerful army. From thence he sent a detachment into Judea, with orders to place Antigonus, the son of Aristobulus upon the throne, who on his side had also raised troops. Hyrcanus, and Phasaël, Herod's brother, upon the proposal of an accommodation, had the imprudence to go to the enemy, who seized them, and put them in irons. Herod escaped from Jerusalem the moment before the Parthians entered it to seize him also.

^a Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 17. de Bell. Jud. 1. 8.

^b A. M. 3960. Ant. J. C. 44. Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 17.

^c A. M. 3961. Ant. J. C. 43. Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 24, 26. Id. de Bell. Jud. i. 11.

Having missed Herod, they plundered the city and country, placed Antigonus upon the throne, and delivered Hyrcanus and Phasaël in chains into his hands. Phasaël, who well knew that his death was resolved, dashed out his brains against the wall, to avoid the hands of the executioner. As for Hyrcanus, his life was granted him ; but to render him incapable of the priesthood, Antigonus caused his ears to be cut off ; for, according to the levitical law,^d it was requisite that the high priest should be perfect in all his members. After having mutilated him, he gave him back to the Parthians, that they might carry him into the east, from whence it would not be possible for him to embroil affairs in Judea.^e He continued a prisoner at Seleucia in Babylonia, till the coming of Phraates to the crown, who caused his chains to be taken off, and gave him entire liberty to see and converse with the Jews of that country, who were very numerous. They looked upon him as their king and high priest, and raised him a revenue sufficient to support his rank with splendour. The love of his native country made him forget all those advantages. He returned the year following to Jerusalem, whither Herod had invited him to come, but put him to death some years afterwards.

^d Levit. xxi. 16—24.

^e Joseph. Antiq. xv. 2.

Herod at first took refuge in Egypt, from whence he went to Rome. Anthony was then in the high degree of power, which the triumvirate had given him. He took Herod under his protection, and even did more in his favour than he expected; for, instead of what he proposed, which was at most to obtain the crown for Aristobulus,^f whose sister Mariamne he had lately married, with the view only of governing under him, as Antipater had done under Hyrcanus; Anthony caused the crown to be conferred upon himself, contrary to the usual maxim of the Romans in like cases; for it was not their custom to violate the rights of the royal houses which acknowledged them for protectors, and to give crowns to strangers. Herod was declared king of Judea by the senate, and conducted by the consuls to the capitol, where he received the investiture of the crown, with the ceremonies usual upon such occasions.

Herod passed only seven days at Rome in negotiating this great affair, and returned speedily to Judea. He employed no more time than three months in his journeys by sea and land.

SECTION VI.

REIGN OF ANTIGONUS, OF ONLY TWO YEARS DURATION.

§ It was not so easy for Herod to establish himself in the possession of the kingdom of Judea, as it had been to obtain his title from the Romans. Antigonus was not at all inclined to resign a throne which had cost him so much pains and money to acquire. He disputed it with him very vigorously for almost two years.

^f Aristobulus was the son of Alexandra, Hyrcanus's daughter; and his father was Alexander, son of Aristobulus, brother of Hyrcanus; so that the right of both brothers to the crown was united in his person.

^a Herod, who during the winter had made great preparations for the following campaign, opened it at length with the siege of Jerusalem, which he invested at the head of a fine and numerous army. Anthony had given orders to Sosius, governor of Syria, to use his utmost endeavours to reduce Antigonus, and to put Herod into full possession of the kingdom of Judea.

Whilst the works necessary to the siege were carrying on, Herod made a tour to Samaria, and at length consummated his marriage with Mariamne. They had been contracted four years to each other ; but the unforeseen troubles, into which he fell, had prevented their consummating the marriage till then. She was the daughter of Alexander, the son of king Aristobulus, and Alexandra, the daughter of Hyrcanus the second, and thereby grand daughter to those two brothers. She was a princess of extraordinary beauty and virtue, and possessed, in an eminent degree all the other qualities that adorn the sex. The attachment of the Jews to the Asmonean family, made Herod imagine, that by espousing her, he should find no difficulty in gaining their affections, which was one of his reasons for consummating his marriage at that time.

On his return to Jerusalem, Sosius and he, having joined their forces, pressed the siege in concert with the utmost vigor, and with a very numerous army, which amounted to at least sixty thousand men. The place, however, held out against them many months with exceeding resolution; and if the besieged had been as expert in the art of war and the defence of places, as they were brave and resolute, it would not perhaps have been taken; but the Romans, who were much better skilled in those things than them, carried the place at length, after a siege of something more than six months.

^a A. M. 3966. Ant. J. C. 38. Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 27. Id. de Bell. Jud. i. 13.

ⁱ The Jews being driven from their posts, the enemy entered on all sides, and made themselves masters of the city; and, to revenge the obstinate resistance they had made, and the pains they had suffered during so long and difficult a siege, they filled all quarters of Jerusalem with blood and slaughter, plundered and destroyed all before them, though Herod did his utmost to prevent both the one and the other.

Antigonus seeing all lost, came and threw himself at the feet of Sosius, in the most submissive and most abject manner. He was put in chains, and sent to Anthony, as soon as he arrived at Antioch. He designed at first to have reserved him for his triumph; but Herod, who did not think himself safe, as long as that branch of the royal family survived, would not let him rest, till he had obtained the death of that unfortunate prince, for which he even gave a large sum of money.^k He was proceeded against in form, condemned to die, and had the sentence executed upon him in the same manner as common criminals, with the rods and axes of the lictor, and was fastened to a stake; a treatment

ⁱ A. M. 3967. Ant. J. C. 37.

^k Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 27.

with which the Romans had never used any crowned head before.

Thus ended the reign of the Asmoneans, after a duration of one hundred and twenty nine years, from the beginning of the government of Judas Maccabeus. Herod entered by this means upon the peaceable possession of the kingdom of Judea.

This singular, extraordinary, and, till then, unexampled event, by which the sovereign authority over the Jews was given to a stranger, an Idumean, ought to have opened their eyes, and rendered them attentive to a celebrated prophecy, which had foretold it in clear terms; had given it as the certain mark of another event, in which the whole nation was interested, which was the perpetual object of their vows and hopes, and distinguished them by a peculiar characteristic from all the other nations of the world, that had an equal interest in it, but without knowing or being apprized of it. This was the prophecy of Jacob, who, at his death, foretold to his twelve sons, assembled round his bed, what would happen in the series of time to the twelve tribes, of which they were the chiefs, and after whom they were called. Amongst the other predictions of that patriarch concerning the tribe of Judah, there is this of which we now speak; ¹“The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be.” The sceptre or rod, for the Hebrew signifies both, implies here the authority and superiority over the other tribes.

¹Gen. xlix. 10.

All the ancient Jews have explained this prediction to denote the Messiah, the fact is therefore incontestable, and is reduced to two essential points. The first is, that as long as the tribe of Judah shall subsist, it shall have preeminence and authority over the other tribes; the second, that it shall subsist, and form a body of a republic, governed by its laws and magistrates, till the Messiah comes.

The first point is verified in the series of the history of the Israelites, wherein that preeminence of the tribe of Judah appears evidently. This is not the proper place for proofs of this kind; those who would be more fully informed, may consult the explanation of Genesis lately published.^m

For the second point, we have only to consider it with the least attention. When Herod, the Idumean, and in consequence a stranger, was placed upon the throne, the authority and superiority which the tribe of Judah had over the other tribes, were first taken from it. The tribe of Judah had no longer the supremacy; it was no longer a body subsisting, from which the magistrates were taken. It was manifest, therefore, that the Messiah was come. But at what time did that tribe become like the rest, and was confounded with them? In the times of Titus Vespasian and Adrian, who finally exterminated the remains of Judah. It was therefore before those times the Messiah came.

How wonderful does God appear in the accomplishment of his prophecies! Would it be making a right use of history, not to dwell a few moments upon facts like these, when we meet them in the course of our matter? Herod, reduced to quit Jerusalem, takes refuge at Rome. He had no thoughts of demanding the sovereignty for himself, but for another. It was the grossest injustice to give it to a stranger, whilst there were princes of the royal family in being; but it had been decreed from all eternity, that Herod should be king of the Jews. Heaven and earth shall sooner pass away than that decree of God not be fulfilled. Anthony was at Rome, and in possession of sovereign power, when Herod arrives there. How many events were necessary to the conducting of things to this point! But is there any thing difficult to the Almighty?

^m By F. Babuty, Rue St. Jacques.

ARTICLE II.

ABRIDGMENT OF THE HISTORY OF THE PARTHIANS.

THE Parthian empire was one of the most powerful and most considerable that ever was in the east. Very weak in its beginnings, as is common, it extended itself by little and little over all Asia Major, and made even the Romans tremble. Its duration is generally allowed to be four hundred and seventy four years; of which two hundred and fifty four were before Jesus Christ, and two hundred and twenty after him. Arsaces was the founder of that empire, from whom all his successors were called Arsacides. Artaxerxes, by birth a Persian, having overcome and slain Artabanus, the last of those kings, transferred the empire of the Parthians to the Persians, in the fifth year of the emperor Alexander, the son of Mammeus. I shall only speak here of the affairs of the Parthians before Jesus Christ, and shall treat them very briefly, except the defeat of Crassus, which I shall relate in all its extent.

ⁿ I have observed elsewhere what gave Arsaces I. occasion to make Parthia revolt, and to expel the Macedonians, who had been in possession of it, from the death of Alexander the Great, and in what manner he had caused himself to be elected king of the Parthians. Theodotus, at the same time made Bactria revolt, and took that province from Antiochus, surnamed Theos.

^o Some time after, Seleucus Callinicus, who succeeded Antiochus, endeavoured in vain to subdue the Parthians. He fell into their hands himself, and was made prisoner; that happened in the reign of Tirdates, called otherwise Arsaces II. brother of the first.

^p Antiochus, surnamed the Great, was more successful than his predecessor. He marched into the east, and repossessed himself of Media, which the Parthians had taken from him. He also entered Parthia, and obliged the ^q king to retire into Hyrcania, from whence he returned soon after with an army of one hundred thousand foot, and twenty thousand horse. As the ⁿ A. M. 3750. Ant. J. C. 254.

^o A. M. 3768. Ant. J. C. 236. ^p A. M. 3792. Ant. J. C. 212.

^q The Abbe Longuezue, in his Latin dissertation upon the Arsacides, ascribes what is here said to Artabanus, whom he places between Arsaces II. and Priapatius. Justin says nothing of them.

war was of a tedious duration, Antiochus made a treaty with Arsaces, by which he left him Parthia and Hyrcania, upon condition that he should assist him in reconquering the revolted provinces. † Antiochus marched afterwards against Euthydemus king of Bactria, with whom he was also obliged to come to an accommodation.

Priapatius, the son of Arsaces II. succeeded his father, and after having reigned fifteen years, left the crown, at his death, to Phraates I. his eldest son.

‡ Phraates left it to Mithridates, whom he preferred before his own issue, upon account of his extraordinary merit, and who was in effect one of the greatest kings the Parthians ever had. He carried his arms farther than Alexander the Great. It was he who made Demetrius Nicator prisoner.

§ Phraates II. succeeded Mithridates his father. Antiochus Sidetes, king of Syria, marched against him at the head of a powerful army, under pretext of delivering his brother Demetrius, who had been long kept in captivity. After having defeated Phraates in three battles, he was himself overthrown and killed in the last, and his army entirely cut to pieces. Phraates, in his turn, at the time he had formed the design of invading Syria, was attacked by the Scythians, and lost his life in a battle.

|| Artabanus, his uncle, reigned in his stead, and died soon after.

† A. M. 3798. Ant. J. C. 206.

‡ A. M. 3840. Ant. J. C. 164.

§ A. M. 3873. Ant. J. C. 131.

|| A. M. 3875. Ant. J. C. 129.

His successor was Mithridates II. of whom Justin ^v says that his great actions acquired him the surname of Great.

He declared war against the Armenians, and by a treaty of peace, which he made with them, he obliged their king to send him his son Tigranes as an hostage.

^w The latter was afterwards set upon the throne of Armenia, by the Parthians themselves, and joined with Mithridates, king of Pontus, in the war against the Romans.

^x Antiochus Eusebes took refuge with Mithridates, who reestablished him in the possession of part of the kingdom of Syria two years after.

^y It was the same Mithridates, as we shall see hereafter, who sent Orobazus to Sylla, to demand the amity and alliance of the Romans, and who caused him to be put to death on his return, for having given place to Sylla.

^z Demetrius Eucerus, who reigned at Damascus, besieging Philip his brother in the city of Berea, was defeated and taken by the Parthian troops sent to the aid of Philip, and carried prisoner to Mithridates, who treated him with all the honours possible. He died there of disease.

^a Mithridates II. died, after having reigned forty years, generally regretted by his subjects. The do-

^v Justin. l. xviii. c. 3. p. 115.

^w A. M. 3909. Ant. J. C. 95. Justin. l. xviii. c. 3.

^x A. M. 3912. Ant. J. C. 92. ^y A. M. 3914. Ant. J. C. 90.

^z A. M. 3915. Ant. J. C. 89. Joseph. Antiq. xiii. 22.

^a A. M. 3915. Ant. J. C. 89. Strab. l. xi. p. 532. Plut. in Lucul. p. 500, &c.

mestic troubles with which his death was followed, considerably weakened the Parthian empire, and made his loss still more sensible. Tigranes reentered upon all the provinces he had given up to the Parthians, and took several others from them. He passed the Euphrates, and made himself master of Syria, and Phœnicia.

During these troubles, the Parthians elected Mnasikires, and after him Sinatrocces, kings, of whom almost nothing more is known than their names.

^b Phraates, the son of the latter, was he who caused himself to be surnamed the God.

He sent ambassadors to Lucullus, after the great victory the Romans had obtained over Tigranes. He held at the same time secret intelligence with the latter. It was at that time Mithridates wrote him the letter which Sallust has preserved.

^c Pompey having been appointed, in the place of Lucullus, to terminate the war against Mithridates, engaged Phraates in the party of the Romans.

The latter joins Tigranes the younger against his father, and breaks with Pompey.

^d After Pompey's return to Rome, Phraates is killed by his own children. Mithridates, his eldest son, takes his place.

Tigranes, king of Armenia, dies almost at the same time. Artavasdes, his son, succeeds him.

^e Mithridates, expelled his kingdom, either by his own subjects, to whom he had rendered himself odious, or by the ambition of his brother Orodes, applies to

^b A. M. 3935. Ant. J. C. 69.

^c A. M. 3938. Ant. J. C. 66.

^d A. M. 3948. Ant. J. C. 56.

^e Justin. l. xlii. c. 4.

Gabinus who commanded in Syria, to reestablish him upon the throne, but without effect. He takes up arms in his own defence. † Besieged in Babylon, and warmly pressed, he surrenders to Orodes, who, considering him only as an enemy, and not a brother, causes him to be put to death, by which means Orodes becomes peaceable possessor of the throne.

‡ But he found enough to employ him abroad, that he had no reason to expect. Crassus had lately been created consul at Rome, with Pompey, for the second time. On the partition of the provinces, Syria fell to Crassus, who was exceedingly rejoiced upon that account, because it favoured the design he had formed of carrying the war into Parthia. When he was in company, even with people he scarce knew, he could not moderate his transports. Amongst his friends, with whom he was under less restraint, he ran even into rhodomontades unworthy of his age and character, and seemed to forget himself in a strange manner. He did not confine his views to the government of Syria, nor to the conquest of some neighbouring provinces, nor even to that of Parthia; he flattered himself with doing such things, as should make the great exploits of Lucullus against Tigranes, and those of Pompey against Mithridates, appear like the feats of infants in comparison with his. He had already overrun in thought Bactria and the Indies, and penetrated as far as the remotest seas, and the extremities of the east. However, in the instructions and powers which were given him, Parthia was in no manner included; but all the world knew his design against it was his darling passion. Such a beginning forebodes no success.

† A. M. 3949. Ant. J. C. 55.

‡ A. M. 3950. Ant. J. C. 54. Plut. in Crass. p. 552—554.

His departure had, besides, something more inauspicious in it. One of the tribunes, named Ateius, threatened to oppose his going, and was joined by many people, who could not suffer him to set out with gaiety of heart, to carry a war against a people who had done the Romans no injury, and were their friends and allies. That tribune, in consequence, having in vain opposed the departure of Crassus, made haste to the gate of the city through which he was to pass, and set a cauldron full of fire before him. When Crassus came to the place, he threw perfumes and poured libations into the pan, uttering over them the most terrible imprecations, which could not be heard without making all present tremble with horror, and of which the misfortunes of Crassus have been regarded by many writers as the accomplishment.

Nothing could stop him. Superior to all opposition, he continued his march, arrived at Brundisium, and though the sea was very tempestuous, embarked, and lost abundance of ships in his passage. When he arrived in Galatia, he had an interview with king Dejotarus, who, though of a very advanced age, was at that time employed in building a new city; upon which Crassus rallied him to this effect; "King of the Galatians, you begin full late to build a city at the twelfth hour of the day."^h "And you, lord Crassus," replied Dejotarus, "are not too early in setting out to make war against the Parthians." For Crassus was at that time upwards of sixty years old, and his countenance made him look still older than he was.

^h The twelfth hour was the end of the day.

ⁱ He had been informed, that there were considerable treasures in the temple of Jerusalem, which Pompey had not ventured to touch. He believed it worth his trouble to go a little out of his way to make himself master of them. He therefore marched thither with his army. Besides the other riches, which amounted to very considerable sums, in it there was a beam of gold, inclosed and concealed in another of wood made hollow for that use ; this was known only by Eleazar the priest, who kept the treasures of the sanctuary. This beam of gold weighed three hundred minæ, each of which weighed two pounds and an half. Eleazer, who was apprized of the motive of Crassus's march to Jerusalem, to save the other riches, which were almost all of them deposited in the temple by private persons, discovered the golden beam to Crassus, and suffered him to take it away, after having made him take an oath not to meddle with the rest. Was he so ignorant as to imagine any thing sacred with avarice ? Crassus took the beam of gold, and notwithstanding made the rest of the treasures his plunder, which amounted to about one million five hundred thousand pounds sterling. He then continued his route.

Every thing succeeded at first as happy as he could have expected. He built a bridge over the Euphrates without any opposition, passed it with his army, and entered the Parthian territories. He invaded them without any other real motive for the war, than the insatiable desire of enriching himself by the plunder of a country which was supposed to be extremely opulent. The Romans under Sylla, and afterwards under Pompey, had made peace, and several treaties with them. There had been no complaint of any infraction or enterprise to give a just pretext for a war ; so that the Parthians expected nothing less than such an invasion ; and, not being upon their guard, had made no preparations for their defence. Crassus, in consequence, was master of the field, and overrun without opposition the greatest part of Mesopotamia. He took also several cities with no resistance ; and had he known how to take advantage of the occasion, it had been easy for him to have penetrated as far as Seleucia and Ctesiphon, to have seized them, and made himself master of all Babylonia, as he had done of Mesopotamia. But instead of pursuing his point in the beginning of autumn, after having left seven thousand foot, and one thousand horse, to secure the cities which had surrendered to him, he repassed the Euphrates, and put his troops into winter quarters in the cities of Syria, where his sole employment was to amass money, and to plunder temples.

ⁱ Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 12.

He was joined there by his son, whom Cesar sent to him out of Gaul, a young man who had already been honoured with several of the military crowns, given by the general to such as distinguished themselves by their valor. He brought with him one thousand chosen horse.

Of all the faults committed by Crassus in this expedition, which were very considerable, the greatest undoubtedly, after that of having undertaken this war, was his hasty return into Syria ; for he ought to have gone on without staying, and to have seized Babylon and Seleucia, cities always at enmity with the Parthians, instead of giving his enemies time to make preparations by his retreat, which was the cause of his ruin.

Whilst he was reassembling all his troops from their winter quarters, ambassadors from the king of Parthia arrived, who opened their commissions in a few words. They told him, that if that army was sent by the Romans against the Parthians, the war could not be terminated by any treaty of peace, and could only be brought to a conclusion by the final ruin of the one or the other empire; that if, as they had been informed, it was only Crassus, who, against the opinion of his country and to satiate his private avarice, had taken arms against them, and entered one of their provinces, the king, their master was well disposed to act with moderation in the affair, to take pity of the age of Crassus, and to suffer the Romans in his dominions, rather shut up than keeping possession of cities, to depart with their lives and rings safe. They spoke, no doubt, of the garrisons left by Crassus in the conquered places. Crassus answered this discourse only with a rhodomontade. He told them, "they should have his answer in the city of Seleucia." Upon which the most ancient of the ambassadors, named Vahises, made an answer, laughing, and showing him the palm of his hand; "Crassus, you will sooner see hair grow in the palm of my hand than Seleucia." The ambassadors retired, and went to give their king notice that he must prepare for war.

^k As soon as the season would permit, Crassus took the field. The Parthians had time, during the winter, to assemble a very great army, to make head against him. Orodes their king divided his troops, and marched in person with one part of them to the frontiers of Armenia; he sent the other into Mesopotamia, under the command of Surena. That general, upon his arrival there, retook several of the places Crassus had made himself master of, the year before.

About the same time, some Roman soldiers, who with exceeding difficulty had escaped out of the cities of Mesopotamia, where they had been in garrison, of which the Parthians had already retaken some, and were besieging the rest, came to Crassus, and related things to him highly capable of disquieting and alarming him. They told him, that they had seen with their own eyes the incredible numbers of the enemy, and that they had also been witnesses of their terrible valor in the bloody attacks of the cities they besieged. They added, that they were troops not to be escaped when they pursued, nor overtaken when they fled; that their arrows, of a weight, and at the same time of an astonishing rapidity, were always attended with mortal wounds, against which it was impossible to defend.

This discourse infinitely abated the courage and boldness of the Roman soldiers, who imagined that the Parthians differed in nothing from the Armenians and Cappadocians, that Lucullus had so easily overthrown, and flattered themselves that the whole difficulty of the war would consist in the length of the way, and the pursuit of the enemy, who would never dare to come to blows with them. They now saw, contrary to their expectation, that they were to experience great battles and great dangers. This discouragement rose so high, that many of the principal officers were of opinion that it was necessary for Crassus, before he advanced farther, to assemble a council, in order to deliberate again upon the whole enterprize. But Crassus listened to no other advice, but of those who pressed him to begin his march, and to make all possible expedition.

^k A. M. 3951. Ant. J. C. 53. Plut. in Crass. p. 554.

What encouraged him the most, and confirmed him in that resolution, was the arrival of Artabasis, king of Armenia. He brought with him a body of six thousand horse, which were part of his guards ; adding, that besides these, he had ten thousand cuirassiers, and thirty thousand foot, at his service. But he advised him to take great care not to march his army into the plains of Mesopotamia, and told him that he must enter the enemy's country by the way of Armenia. The reasons with which he supported this advice were, that Armenia, being a mountainous country, the Parthian horse, in which the greatest strength of their army consisted, would be rendered entirely useless to them ; that if they took this route, he should be in a condition to supply the army with all necessaries ; instead of which, if he marched by the way of Mesopotamia, convoys would be deficient, and he would have a powerful army in his front, on all the marches it would be necessary for him to take, before he could penetrate to the centre of the enemy's dominions ; that in those plains, the horse would have all possible advantages against him ; and, lastly, that he must cross several sandy deserts, where the troops might be in great distress for want of water and provisions. The counsel was excellent, and the reasons unanswerable ; but Crassus, blinded by Providence, which intended to punish the sacrilege he had committed, in plundering the temple of Jerusalem, despised all that was said to him. He only desired Artabasus, who returned into his dominions, to bring him his troops as soon as possible.

I have said, that Providence blinded Crassus, which is self evident in a great measure. But a pagan writer makes the same remark upon it ; this is Dion Cassius, a very judicious historian, and at the same time a warrior. He says, that “ the Romans under Crassus had no salutary view, and were either ignorant upon all occasions of what was necessary to be done, or in no condition to execute it ; so that one would have thought, that condemned and pursued by some divinity, they could neither make use of their bodies nor minds.” That divinity was unknown to Dion, it was he whom the Jewish nation adored, and who avenged the injury done to his temple.

Crassus made haste therefore to set forward. He had seven legions of foot, near four thousand horse, and as many light armed soldiers and archers, which amounted in all to more than forty thousand men, that is to say, one of the finest armies the Romans ever set on foot. When his troops passed the bridge, he had laid over the river Euphrates, near the city of Zeugma, a dreadful storm of thunder and lightning drove in the faces of the soldiers, as if to prevent them from going on. At the same time a black cloud, out of which burst an impetuous whirlwind, attended with thunder claps and lightning, fell upon the bridge, and broke down a part of it. The troops were seized with fear and sadness. He endeavoured to reanimate them in the best manner he was able, promising them with an oath, that they should march back by the way of Armenia ; and concluding his discourse with assuring them, that not one of them should return that way. Those last words, which were ambiguous, and had escaped him very imprudently, threw the whole army into the greatest trouble and dismay. Crassus well knew the bad effect they had produced ; but out of a spirit of obstinacy and haughtiness, he neglected to remedy it, by explaining the sense of those words, to reassure the timorous.

He made his troops advance along the Euphrates. His scouts, whom he had sent out for intelligence, returned, and reported, that there was not a single man to be seen in the country, but that they had found the marks of abundance of horse, which seemed to have fled suddenly as if they had been pursued.

Upon this advice, Crassus confirmed himself in his hopes, and his soldiers began to despise the Parthans, as men that would never have courage to stand a charge, and come to blows with them. Cassius advised him at least to approach some town, where they had a garrison, in order to rest the army a little, and have time to learn the true number of the enemy, their force, and what designs they had in view ; or if Crassus did not approve that counsel, to march along the Euphrates towards Seleucia ; because, by always keeping upon the coast of that river, he would put it out of the power of the Parthians to surround him ; and that, with the fleet that might follow him, provisions might be always brought from Syria, and all other things of which the army might stand in need. This Cassius was Crassus's questor, and the same who afterwards killed Cesar.

Crassus, after having considered this advice, was upon the point of coming into it, when a chief of the Arabians, named Ariamnes, came in unexpectedly, and had the address to make him approve a quite different plan. That Arab had formerly served under Pompey, and was known by many of the Roman soldiers, who looked upon him as a friend. Surena found him entirely qualified to play the part he gave him. Accordingly, when he was conducted to Crassus, he informed him, that the Parthians would not look the Roman army in the face ; that its name alone had already spread an universal terror among their troops ; and that there wanted no more for the obtaining a complete victory, than to march directly up to them, and give them battle. He offered to be their guide himself, and to carry them the shortest way. Crassus, blinded by this flattery, and deceived by a man who knew how to give a specious turn to what he proposed, gave entirely into the snare, notwithstanding the pressing instances of Cassius, and some others, who suspected that impostor's design.

Crassus would hearken to nobody. The traitor Ariamnes, after having persuaded him to draw off from the banks of the Euphrates, conducted him across the plain by a way at first level and easy, but which at length became difficult, from the deep sands, on which the army found itself engaged, in the midst of a vast country, all bare, and of a frightful dryness, where the eye could discover neither end nor boundary, nor the troops hope to find rest and refreshment. If thirst, and the fatigue of the way, discouraged the Romans, the prospect of the country alone threw them into a despair still more terrible ; for they could perceive neither near them, nor at a distance, the least tree, plant, or brook ; not so much as an hill, or a single blade of grass ; nothing was to be seen all round but heaps of burning sand.

This gave just reason to suspect some treachery, of which the arrival of couriers from Artabasus ought to have fully convinced them. That prince informed Crassus, that king Orodes had invaded his dominions with a great army ; that the war he had to support, prevented him from sending the aid he had promised ; but that he advised him to approach Armenia, in order to their uniting their forces against the common enemy ; that, if he would not follow that advice, he cautioned him at least to avoid, in his marches and encampments, the open plains, and such places as were commodious for the horse, and to keep always close to the mountains. Crassus, instead of giving ear to these wise counsels, flew out against those that gave them ; and without vouchsafing to write an answer to Artabasus, he only told his couriers, “ I have not time at present to consider the affairs of Armenia ; I shall go thither soon, and shall then punish Artabasus for his treachery.”

Crassus was so full of this Arab, and so blinded by his artful suggestions, that he had continued to follow him without the least distrust, notwithstanding all the advice that was given him, till he had brought him a great way into the sandy desert we have mentioned. The traitor then made his escape, and gave Surena an account of what he had done.

After a march of some days in a desert of the enemy's country, where it was difficult to have any intelligence, the scouts came in full speed to inform Crassus, that a very numerous army of the Parthians advanced with great order and boldness to attack him immediately. That news threw the whole camp into great trouble and consternation. Crassus was more affected with it than the rest. He made all possible haste to draw up his army in battle. At first, following the advice of Cassius, he extended his infantry as far as he could, that it might take up the more ground, and make it difficult for the enemy to surround him; he posted all his cavalry upon the wings. But afterwards he changed his opinion, and, drawing up his foot in close order, he made them form a large hollow square, facing on all sides, of which each flank had twelve cohorts¹ in front. Every cohort had a company of horse near it, in order that each part, being equally sustained by the cavalry, the whole body might charge with greater security and boldness. He gave one of the wings to Cassius; the other to his young son Crassus; and posted himself in the centre.

¹ The Roman cohort was a body of infantry consisting of five or six hundred men, and differed very little from what is now called a battalion.

They advanced in this order to the banks of a brook, which had not much water, but was however exceedingly grateful to the soldiers, from the exceeding drought and excessive heat.

Most of the officers were of opinion, that it was proper to encamp in this place, to give the troops time to recover the extraordinary fatigues they had undergone in a long and painful march, and to rest there during the night ; that in the mean time, all possible endeavours should be used to get intelligence of the enemy, and that when their number and disposition were known, they might attack them the next day. But Crassus, suffering himself to be carried away by the ardour of his son, and of the horse under his command, who pressed him to lead them against the enemy, gave orders, that all who had occasion for refreshment should eat under arms in their ranks ; and scarce allowing them time for that purpose, he commanded them to march, and led them on, not slowly, and halting sometimes, but with rapidity, and as fast as they could move, till they came in view of the enemy. Contrary to their expectation, they did not appear either so numerous or so terrible as they had been represented, which was a stratagem of Surena. He had concealed the greatest part of his battalions behind the advanced troops ; and, to prevent their being perceived by the brightness of their arms, he had given them orders to cover themselves with their vests or with skins.

When they approached, and were ready to charge, the Parthian general had no sooner given the signal of battle, than the whole field resounded with dreadful cries.

and the most frightful noise ; for the Parthians did not excite their troops to battle with horns or trumpets, but made use of a great number of hollow instruments, covered with leather, and having bells of brass round them, which they struck violently against each other ; the noise made by these instruments was rude and terrible, and seemed like the roaring of wild beasts, joined with claps of thunder. Those barbarians had well observed, that of all the senses, none disorders the soul more than the hearing ; that it strikes upon and affects it the most immediately, and is the most sudden in making it in a manner change its nature.

The trouble and dismay into which this noise had cast the Romans, were quite different when the Parthians, throwing off on a sudden the covering of their arms, appeared all on fire, from the exceeding brightness of their helmets and cuirasses, which were of burnished steel, and glittered like sunbeams, and to which the furniture and armour of their horses added not a little. At their head appeared Surena, handsome, well made, of an advantageous stature, and of a much greater reputation for valor than the effeminacy of his mien seemed to promise ; for he painted after the fashion of the Medes, and like them wore his hair curled, and dressed with art ; whereas the Parthians still persevered in wearing theirs after the manner of the Scythians, much neglected, and such as nature gave them, in order to appear more terrible.

At first the barbarians were for charging the Romans with their pikes, and endeavoured to penetrate and break the front ranks ; but having observed the depth of the hollow square, so well closed and even, in which the troops stood firm and supported each other successfully, they fell back, and retired in a seeming confusion, as if their order of battle were broke. But the Romans were much astonished to see their whole army surrounded on all sides. Crassus immediately gave orders for his archers and light armed foot to charge them ; but they could not execute those orders long ; for they were reduced by an hail of arrows to retire, and cover themselves behind their heavy armed foot.

The disorder and dismay began now, upon experiencing the rapidity and force of those arrows, against which no armour was proof, and which penetrated alike whatever they hit. The Parthians dividing, applied themselves to shooting at a distance, without its being possible for them to miss, though they had endeavoured it ; so close were the Romans embattled. They did dreadful execution, and made deep wounds ; because drawing their bows to the utmost, the strings discharged their arrows, of an extraordinary weight, with an impetuosity and force, that nothing could resist.

The Romans, attacked in this manner on all sides by the enemy, knew not in what manner to act. If they continued firm in their ranks they were wounded mortally ; and if they quitted them to charge the enemy they could do them no hurt, and suffered no less than before. The Parthians fled before them, and kept a continual discharge as they retired ; for, of all nations in the world they were the most expert in that exercise after the Scythians ; an operation in reality very wisely conceived ; for, in flying they saved their lives, and in fighting avoided the infamy of flight.

As long as the Romans had hopes that the barbarians, after having exhausted all their arrows, would either give over the fight, or come to blows with them, hand to hand, they supported their distress with valor and resolution ; but when they perceived that in the rear of the enemy there were camels laden with arrows, whither those who had exhausted their quivers wheeled about to replenish them, Crassus, losing almost all courage, sent orders to his son to endeavour, whatever it cost him, to join the enemy, before he was entirely surrounded by them ; for they were principally intent upon him, and were wheeling about to take him in the rear.

Young Crassus, therefore, at the head of thirteen hundred horse, five hundred archers, and eight cohorts,^m armed with round bucklers, wheeled about against those who endeavoured to surround him. The latter, whether they were afraid to stand before a body of troops that came on with so good an aspect, or rather designed to draw off young Crassus as far as they could from his father, immediately faced about and fled. Young Crassus upon that, crying out as loud as he could, "they don't stand us," pushed on full speed after them. The foot, animated by the example of the horse, piqued themselves upon not staying behind, and followed them at their heels. Carried on by their eagerness, and the joy which the hopes of victory gave them, they firmly believed they had conquered, and had nothing to do but to pursue, till, being at a great distance from their main body, they discovered their error ; for those who seemed to fly, faced about, and being joined by many other troops, came on to charge the Romans.

^m They consisted of near six thousand men.

Young Crassus thereupon made his troops halt, in hopes that the enemy, upon seeing their small number, would not fail to attack them, and come to close fight ; but those barbarians contented themselves with opposing him in front with their heavy armed horse, and sent out detachments of their light horse, that wheeling about, and surrounding them on all sides without joining them poured in a perpetual flight of arrows upon them. At the same time, by stirring up the heaps of sand, they raised so thick a dust that the Romans could neither see nor speak to one another ; and by being pent up in a narrow space, and keeping close order, they were a kind of butt for every arrow shot at them, and died by slow, but cruel deaths. For finding their entrails pierced, and not being able to support the pains they suffered, they rolled themselves upon the sands with the arrows in their bodies, and expired in that manner in exquisite torments ; for endeavouring to tear out by force the bearded points of the arrows, which had penetrated across their veins and nerves, they only made their wounds the larger, and increased their pains.

Most of them died in this manner ; and those who were still alive, were no longer in any condition to act. For when young Crassus exhorted them to charge the heavy armed horse, they showed him their hands nailed to their bucklers, and their feet pierced through and through, and rivetted to the ground ; so that it was equally impossible for them either to defend themselves, or fly. Putting himself therefore at the head of his horse, he made a vigorous charge upon that heavy armed body, covered with iron, and threw himself boldly among the squadrons, but with great disadvantage, as well in attacking as defending ; for his troops, with weak and short javelins, struck against armour either of excellent steel, or very hard leather ; whereas the barbarians charged the Gauls, who were either naked or lightly armed, with good and strong spears. These Gauls were troops in whom young Crassus placed the greatest confidence, and with whom he did most wonderful exploits ; for those troops took hold of the spears of the Parthians, and closing with them, seized them by the neck, and threw them off their horses upon the ground, where they lay without power to stir, from the exceeding weight of their arms. Several of the Gauls, quitting their horses, crept under those of the enemy, and thrust their swords into their bellies. The horses wild with the pain, leaped and reared, and throwing off their riders, trampled them under foot as was the enemy, and fell dead upon both.

But what gave the Gauls most trouble, was heat and thirst ; for they were not accustomed to support them. They lost also the greatest part of their horses, which running precipitately upon that heavy armed body, killed themselves upon their spears.

They were obliged therefore to retire to their infantry, and to carry off young Crassus, who had received several dangerous wounds.

Upon their way, they saw, at a small distance, a rising bank of sand, to which they retired. They fastened their horses in the centre, and made an inclosure with their bucklers, by way of intrenchment, in hopes that it would assist them considerably in defending themselves against the barbarians ; but it happened quite otherwise ; for, in an even place the front covered the rear, and gave it some relaxation, whereas upon this hill, the inequality of the ground showing them over each other's heads, and those in the rear most, they were all exposed to the enemy's shot. So that, unable to avoid the arrows which the barbarians showered continually upon them, they were all equally the marks of them, and deplored their unhappy destiny, in perishing miserably, without being able to make use of their arms, or to give the enemy proofs of their valor.

Young Crassus had two Greeks with him, who had settled in that country in the city of Carræ. Those two young men, touched with compassion to see him in so sad a condition, pressed him to make off with them, and to retire into the city of Ischnes, which had espoused the party of the Romans, and was not very remote. But he replied, " that the fear of no death, however cruel, could induce him to abandon so many brave men, who died out of love for him." A noble sentiment for a young lord ! He ordered them to make off as fast as they could, and embracing them, dismissed them the service. For himself, not being able to make use of his hand, which was shot through with an arrow, he commanded one of his domestics to thrust his sword through him, and presented his side to him. The principal officers killed themselves, and many of those that remained were slain, fighting with exceeding valor. The Parthians made only about five hundred prisoners, and after having cut off young Crassus's head, marched immediately against his father.

The latter, after having ordered his son to charge the Parthians, and received advice, that they were put to the route and pursued vigorously, had resumed some courage, and the more, because those who opposed him, seemed to abate considerably of their ardour; for the greatest part of them were gone with the rest against young Crassus. Wherefore, drawing his army together, he retired to a small hill in his rear, in hopes that his son would speedily return from the pursuit.

Of a great number of officers, sent successively by his son, to inform him of the danger he was in, the greatest part had fallen into the hands of the barbarians, who had put them to the sword. Only the last, who had escaped with great difficulty, got to his presence, and declared to him that his son was lost, if he did not send him directly a powerful reinforcement. Upon this news, Crassus was struck with such a diversity of afflicting thoughts, and his reason thereby so much disturbed, that he was no longer capable of seeing or hearing any thing. However, the desire of saving his son and the army, determined him to go to his aid, and he ordered the troops to march.

The Parthians, who returned from the defeat of young Crassus, arrived that moment with great cries and songs of victory, which from far apprized the unfortunate father of his misfortune. The barbarians, carrying the head of young Crassus upon the end of a spear, approached the Romans, and insulting them with the most scornful bravadoes, they asked them of what family and relations that young Roman was ; “ For,” said they, “ it is impossible that a young man of such extraordinary valor and bravery, should be the son of so base and cowardly a father as Crassus.”

This sight exceedingly dispirited the Romans, and instead of exciting the height of anger, and the desire of revenge in them, froze them with terror and dismay. Crassus, however, showed more constancy and courage on his disgrace, than he had done before ; and running through the ranks, he cried out, “ Romans, this mourning regards only me. The fortune and glory of Rome are still invulnerable and invincible, whilst you continue firm and intrepid. If you have any compassion for a father, who has just now lost a son, whose valor you admired, let it appear in your rage and resentment against the barbarians. Deprive them of their insolent joy, punish their cruelty, and do not suffer yourselves to be cast down by my misfortune. There is a necessity for experiencing some loss, when we aspire at great achievements. Lucullus did not defeat Tigranes, nor Scipio, Antiochus, without costing them some blood. It is after the greatest defeats that Rome has acquired the greatest victories. It is not by the favour of fortune she has attained to so high a degree of power, but by her patience and fortitude in supporting herself with vigor against adversity.”

Crassus endeavoured by remonstrances of this kind to reanimate his troops ; but when he had given them orders to raise the cry of battle, he perceived the general discouragement of his army, even in that cry itself, which was faint, unequal, and timorous ; whereas that of the enemy was bold, full and strenuous.

The charge being given, in consequence, the light horse of the Parthians dispersed themselves upon the wings of the Romans, and taking them in flank, distressed them extremely with their arrows ; whilst the heavy cavalry attacked them in front, and obliged them to close up in one great body, except those, who, to avoid the arrows of which the wounds occasioned a long and painful death, had the courage to throw themselves upon the horse, like men in despair. Though they did not do them much hurt, their audacity was attended with this advantage ; it occasioned their dying immediately, by the large and deep wounds they received ; for the barbarians thrust their lances through their bodies with such force and vigor, that they often killed two at once.

After having fought in that manner the remainder of the day, upon nights coming on, the barbarians retired, saying, they would grant Crassus only that night to lament for his son, unless he should find it more expedient to consult his own safety, and prefer going voluntarily to being dragged to their king Arsaces. They then encamped in the presence of the Roman army, in the firm expectation, that the next day they should meet with little or no difficulty in completing its defeat.

This was a terrible night for the Romans. They had no thoughts either of interring their dead, or of dressing their wounded, of whom the greatest part died in the most horrible torments. Every man was solely intent upon his particular distress ; for they all saw plainly, that they could not escape, whether they waited for day in the camp, or ventured, during the night, to throw themselves into that immense plain, of which they saw no end. Besides which, in the latter choice, their wounded gave them great trouble. For to carry them off would be very difficult, and extremely retard their flight ; and if they were left behind, it was not to be doubted but they would discover the departure of the army by their cries and lamentations.

Though they were perfectly sensible that Crassus alone was the cause of all their misfortunes, they however were unanimous in desiring to see his face, and to hear his voice. But for him, lying upon the ground, in an obscure corner, with his head covered in his cloak, he was to the vulgar, says Plutarch, a great example of the instability of fortune ; to wise and considerate persons, a still greater of the pernicious effects of temerity and ambition, which had blinded him to such a degree, that he could not bare to be less at Rome than the first of so many millions of men, and thought himself low and mean, because there were two above him, Cesar and Pompey.

Octavius, one of his lieutenants, and Cassius approached him, and endeavoured to make him rise, and to console and encourage him. But seeing him entirely depressed by the weight of his affliction, and deaf to all consolation and remonstrance, they assembled the principal officers, and held a council of war directly ; and it being their unanimous opinion that it was necessary to retire immediately, they decamped without sound of trumpet. This was done at first with great silence. But soon after, the sick and wounded who could not follow, perceiving themselves abandoned, filled the camp with tumult and confusion, cries, shrieks, and horrible lamentations ; so that the troops who marched foremost were seized with trouble and terror, imagining the enemy were coming on to attack them. By frequently turning back, and drawing up in battle, or busying themselves in setting the wounded, who followed them, upon the beasts of carriage, and in dismounting such as were less sick, they lost abundance of time. There were only three hundred horse, under the command of Ignatius, who did not stop, and arrived about midnight, at the city of Carræ. Ignatius called to the sentinels upon the walls ; and when they answered, bade them go to Coponius, who commanded in the place, and tell him that Crassus had fought a great battle with the Parthians ; and without saying any more, or letting them know who he was, he pushed on with all possible expedition to the bridge Crassus had laid over the Euphrates, and saved his troops by that means. But he was very much blamed for having abandoned his general.

However, the message he had sent to Coponius by those guards, was of great service to Crassus ; for that governor, wisely conjecturing from the manner in which the unknown person had given him that intelligence, that it implied some disaster, gave orders immediately for the garrison to stand to their arms. And when he was informed of the way Crassus had taken, he marched out to meet him, and conducted him and his army into the city. The Parthians, though well informed of his flight, would not pursue him in the dark, but the next day early entered the camp, and put all the wounded who had been left there, to the number of four thousand to the sword ; and their cavalry being dispersed over the plain after those who fled, took abundance of them, whom they found straggling on all sides.

One of Crassus's lieutenants, named Vargunteius, having separated in the night from the gross of the army with four cohorts, missed his way, and was found the next morning upon a small eminence by the barbarians, who attacked him. He defended himself with great valor, but was at length overpowered by multitudes, and all his soldiers killed, except twenty, who, with sword in hand, fell on the enemy in despair, in order to open themselves a passage through them. The barbarians were so much astonished at their bravery, that out of admiration of it, they opened, and gave them a passage. They arrived safe at Carræ.

At the same time Surena received false advice, that Crassus had escaped with the best of his troops, and that those who had retired to Carræ, were only a militia, that were not worth the trouble of pursuing. Surena believing the reward of his victory lost, but still uncertain whether it was or not, desired to be better informed, in order to his resolving either to besiege Carræ if Crassus was there, or to pursue him if he had quitted it. He therefore despatched one of his interpreters, who spoke both languages perfectly well, with orders to approach the walls of Carræ, and in the Roman language to desire to speak with Crassus himself, or Cassius, and to say, that Surena demanded a conference with them.

The interpreter having executed his orders, Crassus accepted the proposal with joy. Soon after some Arabian soldiers came from the barbarians who knew Crassus and Cassius by sight, from having seen them in the camp before the battle. Those soldiers approached the place, and seeing Cassius upon the walls, they told him, that Surena was inclined to treat with them, and permit them to retire, upon condition that they would continue in amity with the king his master, and abandon Mesopotamia to him ; that this was more advantageous for both parties than to proceed to the last extremities.

Cassius came in to this, and demanded that the time and place for an interview should immediately be fixed. The Arabians assured him that they would go and do their utmost to that effect, and withdrew.

Surena, overjoyed with keeping his prey in a place from whence it could not escape, marched thither the next day with his Parthians, who talked at first with extreme haughtiness, and declared, that if the Romans expected any favourable terms from them, they must previously deliver up Crassus and Cassius, bound hand and foot, into their hands. The Romans enraged at such exceeding deceit, told Crassus, that it was necessary to renounce all remote and vain hopes of aid from the Armenians, and fly that very night, without losing a moment's time. It was highly important, that not one of the inhabitants of Carræ should know his design till the instant of its execution. But Andromachus, one of the citizens, was informed of it first, and by Crassus himself, who confided it to him, and chose him for his guide, relying very injudiciously upon his fidelity.

The Parthians, in consequence, were not long before they were fully apprized of the whole plan, by the means of that traitor. But as it was not their custom to engage in the night, the impostor, to prevent Crassus from getting so much ground as might make it impossible for the Parthians to come up with him, led the Romans sometimes by one way, sometimes by another, and at length brought them into deep marshy grounds, and places abounding with great ditches, where it was very difficult to march, and necessary to make a great many turnings and windings, to extricate themselves out of that labyrinth.

There were some, who, suspecting that it was with no good design Andromachus made them go backwards and forwards in that manner, refused at last to follow him; and Cassius himself returned towards Carræ. By hasty marches he escaped into Syria with five hundred horse. Most of the rest, who had trusty guides, gained the pass of the mountains called Sinna-chi, and were in a place of safety before the break of day. The latter might be about five thousand men, under the command of Octavius.

As for Crassus, the day overtook him, still embarrassed by the contrivance of the perfidious Andromachus, in those marshy and difficult places. He had with him four cohorts of foot, armed with round bucklers, a few horse, and five lictors who carried the fasces before him. He at length came into the main road, after abundance of trouble and difficulty, when the enemy were almost upon him, and he had no more than twelve stadia to make, before he joined the troops under Octavius. All he could do was to gain, as soon as possible, another summit of those mountains, less impracticable to the horse, and in consequence not so secure. This was under that of the Sinnachi, to which it was joined by a long chain of mountains that filled up all the space between them. Octavius therefore saw plainly the danger that threatened Crassus, and descended first himself from those eminences with a small number of soldiers, to his aid. But he was soon followed by the rest, who, reproaching themselves for their cowardice, flew to his assistance. Upon their arrival, they charged the barbarians so rudely, that they obliged them to abandon the hill. After that they placed Crassus in the midst of them, and forming a kind of rampart for him with their bucklers, they declared fiercely, that not an arrow of the enemy should approach their general's body, till they were all dead round him, fighting in his defence.

Surena seeing that the Parthians, already repulsed, went on with less vigor to the attack, and if the night came on, and the Romans should make the mountains, that it would be impossible for him to take them, he had again recourse to stratagem to amuse Crassus. He gave secret orders that some prisoners should be set at liberty, after having posted a number of his soldiers around them, who, seeming in discourse together, said, as the general report of the army, that the king was much averse to continuing the war with the Romans ; that, on the contrary, his design was to cultivate their amity, and to give them proofs of his favourable inclinations, by treating Crassus with great humanity ; and, that the effects might agree with their expressions, as soon as the prisoners were released, the barbarians retired from the fight, and Surena, advancing peaceably with his principal officers towards the hill, with his bow unstrung, and arms extended, invited Crassus to come down and treat of an accommodation. He said with a loud voice, that, contrary to the king his master's will, and through the necessity of a just defence, he had made them experience the force and power of the Parthian arms ; and that at present he was disposed to treat them with mildness and favour, by granting them liberty to retire with entire security on his part. We have observed on more than one occasion, that the peculiar characteristic of these barbarians was to promote the success of their designs by fraud and treachery, and to make no scruple of breaking through their engagements upon such occasions.

The troops of Crassus lent a willing ear to this discourse of Surena, and expressed exceeding joy at it ; but Crassus, who had experienced nothing but deceit and perfidy from these barbarians, and to whom so sudden a change was very suspicious, did not easily give in to it, and deliberated with his friends. The soldiers began to call out to him, and to urge him to accept the interview. From thence they proceeded to outrage and reproaches, and went so far as to accuse him of cowardice ; charging him with exposing them to be slaughtered by enemies with whom he had not so much as the courage to speak when they appeared unarmed before him.

Crassus at first had recourse to intreaties, and remonstrated to them, that by maintaining their ground for the rest of the day, upon the eminences and difficult places, where they then were, they might easily save themselves when night came on ; he even showed them the way, and exhorted them not to frustrate such hopes of their approaching safety. But seeing they grew outrageous, that they were ready to mutiny, and by striking their swords upon their shields, even menaced him ; apprehending that commotion, he began to descend, and turning about, he only said these few words ; “ Octavius, and you Petronius, with all the officers and captains here present, you see the necessity I am under of taking a step I would willingly avoid, and are witnesses of the indignities and violence I suffer. But I beg you, when you have retired in safety, that you will tell all the world, for the honour of Rome our common mother, that Crassus perished deceived by the enemy, and not abandoned by his citizens.” Octavius and Petronius could not resolve to let him go alone, but went down the hill with him, when Crassus dismissed his lictors, who would have followed him.

The first persons the barbarians sent to him, were two Greeks, who, dismounting from their horses, saluted him with profound respect, and told him in the Greek tongue, that he had only to send some of his attendants, and Surena would satisfy him, that himself and those with him came without arms, and with all the fidelity and good intentions possible. Crassus replied, that had he set the least value upon his life, he should not have come to have put himself into their hands ; and sent two brothers, named Roscius, to know only upon what footing they should treat, and in what number.

Surena caused those two brothers to be seized and kept prisoners ; and advancing on horseback, followed by the principal officers of his army, as soon as he perceived Crassus, “ What do I see !” said he, “ what ! the general of the Romans on foot, and we on horseback ! Let an horse be brought immediately.” He imagined that Crassus appeared in that manner before him out of respect. Crassus replied, “ That there was no reason to be surprised that they came to an interview each after the custom of his own country.”ⁿ “ Very good,” returned Surena ; “ from henceforth let there be a treaty of peace between king Orodes and the Romans ; but we must go to prepare and sign the articles of it upon the banks of the Euphrates ; for you Romans,” added he, “ do not always remember your conventions.” At the same time he held out his hand to him. Crassus would have sent for an horse ; but Surena told him there was no occasion for it, and that the king made him a present of that.

A horse was immediately presented to him, which had a golden bit ; and the king’s officers, taking him round the middle, set him upon it, surrounded him, and began to strike the horse to make him go forwards fast. Octavius was the first, who, offended at such behaviour, took the horse by the bridle. Petronius seconded him, and afterwards all the rest of his attendants, who came round him, and endeavoured to stop the horse, and to make those retire by force, who pressed Crassus forwards. At first they pushed against each other with great tumult and disorder, and afterwards came to blows ; Octavius, drawing his sword, killed a groom of one of those barbarians. At the same time another of them gave Octavius a great wound with his sword behind, which laid him dead upon the spot. Petronius, who had no shield, received a stroke upon his cuirass, and leaped from his horse without being wounded. Crassus at the same moment was killed by a Parthian. Of those that were present, some were killed fighting around Crassus, and others retired in good time to the hill.

ⁿ Amongst the Romans the consul always marched on foot, at the head of the infantry.

The Parthians soon followed them thither, and told them, that Crassus had suffered the punishment due to his treachery ; but for them, that Surena let them know they had only to come down with confidence, and gave them his word that they should suffer no ill treatment. Upon this promise, some went down and put themselves into the hands of the enemy ; others took the advantage of the night, and dispersed on all sides. But of the latter very few escaped ; all the rest were pursued the next day by the Arabians, who came up with them and put them to the sword.

The loss of this battle was the most terrible blow the Romans had received from the battle of Cannæ. They had twenty thousand men killed in it, and ten thousand taken prisoners. The rest made their escape by different ways into Armenia, Cilicia, and Syria ; and out of these wrecks another army was afterwards formed in Syria, of which Cassius, took upon him the command, and with it prevented that country from falling into the hands of the victor.

This defeat ought in one sense to have been more affecting to them than that of the battle of Cannæ, because they had less reason to expect it. When Hannibal was victorious at Cannæ, Rome was in a state of humiliation ; she had already lost many battles, and had no thought but of defending herself and repulsing the enemy. At this time Rome was triumphant, respected, and formidable to all nations ; she was mistress of the most potent kingdoms of Europe, Asia, and Africa, lately victorious over one of the most powerful enemies she ever had ; yet in the most exalted height of her greatness, she saw her glory suddenly fall to the ground, in an attack upon a people, formed out of the assemblage of the eastern nations, whose valor she despised, and whom she reckoned already almost amongst her conquests. So complete a victory showed those haughty conquerors of the world a rival in a remote people, capable of making head against, and of disputing the empire of the universe with them ; and, not only of setting bounds to their ambitious projects, but of making them apprehend for their own safety. It showed that the Romans might be overthrown in a pitched battle, and fighting with all their forces ; that that power, which till then, like the inundation of a mighty sea, had overflowed all the countries in its way, might at length receive bounds, and be restrained for the future within them.

The check received by Crassus from the Parthians was a blot on the Roman name, which the victories gained some time after by Ventidius were not capable of effacing. The standards of the vanquished legions were always shown to them as sights. ° The prisoners taken in that fatal day were kept there in captivity ; and the Romans, citizens or allies, contracted ignominious marriages, to the shame of Rome, as Horace emphatically describes it, and grew old in tranquillity, upon the lands, and under the standard of the barbarians. It was not till thirty years after, in the reign of Augustus, that the king of the Parthians, without being compelled to it by arms, consented to restore their standards and prisoners to the Romans, which was looked upon by Augustus, and the whole empire, as a most glorious triumph ; so much were the Romans humbled by the remembrance of that defeat, and so much did they believe it incumbent on them to efface it, if possible, to the least trace ; for themselves they could never forget it. Cesar was upon the point of setting out against the Parthians, to avenge the affront Rome had received from them, when he was killed. Anthony formed the same design, which turned to his disgrace. The Romans, from that time, always regarded the war with the Parthians as the most important of their wars. It was the object of the application of their most warlike emperors, Trajan, Septimus, Severus, &c. The surname of Parthicus was the title of

° Milesne Crassi conjuge Barbara
 Turpis maritus vixit ? et hostium, Proh Curia, inversique mores !
 Consenuit socerorum in armis ;
 Sub rege Medo Marsus et Appulus, Anciliorum nominis et togæ Oblitus, eternæque Vestæ, Incolumi Jove, et urbe Roma ?

which they were fondest, and most sensibly flattered their ambition. If the Romans sometimes passed the Euphrates to extend their conquests beyond it, the Parthians in their turn, did the same, to carry their arms and devastations into Syria, and even into Palestine. In a word, the Romans could never subject the Parthians to their yoke ; and that nation was like a wall of brass, which, with impregnable force, resisted the most violent attacks of their power.

When the battle of Carræ was fought, Orodes was in Armenia, where he had lately concluded a peace with Artabasus. The latter, upon the return of the expresses he had sent to Crassus, perceiving, by the false measures he took, that the Romans were infallibly lost, made an accommodation with Orodes ; and, by giving one of his daughters to Pacorus, the son of the Parthian king, he cemented by that alliance the treaty he had lately made. Whilst they were celebrating the nuptials, the head and hand of Crassus were brought to them, which Surena had caused to be cut off, and sent to the king as a proof of his victory. Their joy was exceedingly augmented by that sight, and it was said, that orders were given to pour molten gold into the mouth of that head, to reproach the insatiable thirst which Crassus always had for that metal.

Surena did not long enjoy the pleasure of his victory. His master, jealous of his glory, and of the credit it gave him, caused him to be put to death soon after. There are princes, near whom too shining qualities are dangerous, who take umbrage at the virtues they are forced to admire, and cannot bear to be served by superior talents, capable of eclipsing their own.

Orodes was of this character.^p He perceived, as Tacitus observes of Tibereus, that with all his power he could not sufficiently repay the service his general had lately done him. Now, when a benefit is above all return, ingratitude and hatred take place, instead of acknowledgment and affection.

Surena was a general of extraordinary merit. He was of consummate ability at thirty years of age, and surpassed all men of his times in valor. He was, besides that, perfectly well made, and of the most advantageous stature. For riches, credit, and authority, he had also more than any man, and was, undoubtedly the greatest subject the king of Parthia had. His birth gave him the privilege of putting the crown upon the king's head at his coronation; and that right had appertained to his family from the establishment of the empire. When he travelled, he had always one thousand camels to carry his baggage, two hundred chariots for his wives and concubines, and for his guard, one thousand horse completely armed, besides a great number of light armed troops and domestics, which in all did not amount to less than ten thousand men.

The Parthians expecting, after the defeat of the Roman army, to find Syria without defence, marched to conquer it. But Cassius, who had formed an army out of the ruins of the other, received them with so much vigor, that they were obliged to repass the Euphrates shamefully, without effecting any thing.

^p Destruï per hæc fortunam suam Cæsar, imparenque tanto merito rebatur. Nam beneficia eo usque læta sunt, dum videntur exsolvi posse; ubi multum antevenere, pro gratia odium redditur. Tacit. Annal. l. iv. c. 18.

⁹ The next year the consuls, M. Calpurnius Bibulus and M. Tullius Cicero, were assigned the provinces of Syria and Cilicia. Cicero repaired immediately to the latter, which had been allotted him; but Bibulus amusing himself at Rome, Cassius continued to command in Syria. And that was much to the advantage of the Romans; for the affairs of that country required a man of a quite different capacity to Bibulus. Pacorus, son of Orodes king of the Parthians, had passed the Euphrates in the beginning of the spring, at the head of a numerous army, and had entered Syria. He was too young to command alone and was therefore accompanied by Orsaces, an old general, who disposed every thing. He marched directly to Antioch, which he besieged. Cassius had shut himself up in that place with all his troops. Cicero, who had received advice of his condition in his province, by the means of Antiochus king of Comagena, assembled all his forces, and marched to the eastern frontier of his province, which bordered upon Armenia, to oppose an invasion on that side, should the Armenians attempt it, and at the same time to be at hand to support Cassius in case of need. He sent another body of troops towards the mountain Amanus, with the same view. That detachment fell in with a great detachment of the Parthian cavalry, which had entered Cilicia, and entirely defeated it; so that not a single man escaped.

⁹ A. M. 3953. Ant. J. C. 51. Cic. ad Famil. l. ii. Epist. x. 17. iii. 2 xii. 19. xv. 1—4. Ad Attic. l. v. 18—21. vi. 1. 8. vii. 2.

The news of this defeat, and that of Cicero's approach to Antioch, extremely encouraged Cassius and his troops to make a good defence, and so much abated the ardour of the Parthians, that despairing to carry the place they raised the siege, and went to form that of Antigonía, which was not far from thence. But they were so little skilled in attacking towns, that they miscarried again before this, and were reduced to retire. That was no wonder; the Parthians made their principal force consist in cavalry, and applied themselves most to field battle, which suited their genius best. Cassius, who was apprized of the route they would take, laid an ambuscade for them, which they did not fail to fall into. He defeated them entirely, and killed a great number of them; amongst whom was their general Orsaces. The remains of their army repassed the Euphrates.

When Cicero saw the Parthians removed, and Antioch out of danger, he turned his arms against the inhabitants of mount Amanus, who being situate between Syria and Cilicia, were independent of, and at war with both these provinces. They made continual incursions into them, and gave them great trouble. Cicero entirely subjected those mountaineers, and took and demolished all their castles and forts. He afterwards marched against another barbarous nation, a kind of savages, who called themselves free Cilicians,^r and pretended to have never been subjected to the empire of any of the kings who had been masters of the countries round about. He took all their cities, and made such dispositions in the country as very much pleased all their neighbours whom they perpetually harassed.

^r Eleuthero Cilices.

It is Cicero himself who relates these circumstances in several of his letters. There are two, among the rest, which may be looked upon as perfect models of the manner in which a general or commander ought to give a prince or his ministry an account of a military expedition; with such simplicity, perspicuity, and precision, in which the proper character of writings and relations of this kind consists, are they expressed. The first is addressed to the senate and people of Rome, and to the principal magistrates; it is the second of his fifteenth book of familiar epistles; the other is written particularly to Cato. This last is a masterpiece; wherein Cicero, who passionately desired the honour of a triumph for his military expeditions, employs all the art and address of eloquence to engage that grave senator in his favour. Plutarch tells us,^s that after his return to Rome, the senate offered him a triumph; and that he refused it upon account of the civil war then ready to break out between Cesar and Pompey, not believing that it became him to celebrate a solemnity which breathed nothing but joy, at a time when the state was upon the point of falling into the greatest calamities. His refusal to triumph in the midst of the apprehensions and disorders of a bloody civil war, argues in Cicero a great love for the public good and his country, and does him much more honour than a triumph itself could have done.

During the civil war between Pompey and Cesar, and those that followed, the Parthians, declaring sometimes for one, and sometimes for the other party, made several irruptions into Syria and Palestine. But those are events which particularly relate to the Roman or Jewish histories, and therefore do not enter into my plan.

^s Plut. in Cic. p. 879.

I shall conclude this abridgment of that of the Parthians, with the deaths of Pacorus and Orodes his father. Ventidius, who commanded the Roman armies, under the authority of Anthony the triumvir, did not a little contribute to the reestablishing the honour of the nation. He was a soldier of fortune, who, from the lowest condition of life,^c had raised himself by his merit to the highest dignities of the republic. In the war against the allies of Rome, who attempted to extort the freedom of the city by force, he was taken an infant, with his mother in Asculum, the capital of the Picenians, by Strabo, the father of Pompey the Great, and led in triumph before that general. Supported by the credit of C. Cesar, under whom he had served in Gaul, and passed through all the degrees of the army, he became pretor and consul. He was the only person that triumphed for his exploits against the Parthians, and obtained that honour after having been led in a triumph himself.

I have said that Ventidius contributed very much to make the Romans amends for the affront they had received at the battle of Carræ. He had begun to revenge the defeat of Crassus and his army, by two successive victories gained over those terrible enemies.

^c Vell. Paterc. l. ii. c. 65. Val. Max. l. vi. c. 9. Aul. Gell. l. xv. c. 4.

A third, still greater than the former, completed the work, and was obtained in this manner.

“ That general, apprehending the Parthians, whose preparations were much advanced, would prevent him, and pass the Euphrates before he had time to draw all his troops together, out of their different quarters, had recourse to this stratagem. There was a petty eastern prince in his camp, under the name of an ally, whom he knew to be entirely in the interest of the Parthians, and that he held secret intelligence with them, and gave them advice of all the designs of the Romans which he could discover. He resolved to make this man’s treachery the means to draw the Parthians into a snare he had laid for them.

With that view he contracted a more than ordinary intimacy with this traitor. He conversed frequently with him upon the operations of the campaign. Affecting at length to open himself to him with great confidence, he observed, that he was much afraid, from advices he had received, that the Parthians did not design to pass the Euphrates at Zeugma, as usual, but a great way lower ; for, said he, if they pass at Zeugma, the country on this side is so mountainous that the cavalry, in which the whole force of their army consists, can do us no great hurt ; but if they pass below, there are nothing but plains, where they will have all manner of advantages against us ; and it will be impossible for us to make head against them. As soon as he had imparted this secret to him, the spy did not fail, as Ventidius had rightly foreseen, to communicate it to the Parthians, with whom it had all the effect he could desire. Pacorus, instead of going to Zeugma, immediately took the other route, lost abundance of time in the great compass he was obliged to take, and in the preparations necessary for passing the river there. Ventidius got forty days by this means, which he employed in making Silon of Judea join him, with the legions quartered on the other side of mount Taurus, and found himself in a condition to give the Parthians a good reception, when they entered Syria.

“ A. M. 3965. Ant. J. C. 39. Joseph. Antiq. xiv. c. 24. Plut. in Anton. p. 931. Appian. in Parth. p. 156. Dion. Cass. l. xlix. p. 403, 404. Justin. l. xlii. c. 4.

As they saw that they had not been attacked either in passing the river, or afterwards, they attributed that inactivity to terror and cowardice, and marched directly to charge the enemy in their camp, though situated very advantageously upon an eminence, not doubting but they should soon make themselves masters of it, and that without much resistance. They were mistaken. The Romans quitted their camp, fell on them with impetuosity, and pushed them with the utmost vigor upon the declivity; and, as they had the advantage of the ground, and their light armed troops poured showers of darts upon the Parthians, they soon put them into disorder, notwithstanding the vigorous resistance they made at first. The slaughter was very great. Pacorus was killed in the battle; and his death was followed immediately with the flight of his whole army. The vanquished made haste to regain the bridge, in order to return into their own country; but the Romans prevented them, and cut the greatest part of them in pieces. Some few escaped by flight, and retired to Antiochus king of Comagena. History observes, that this celebrated battle, which so well revenged the defeat of Crassus, was fought exactly on the same day with the battle of Carræ, fourteen years before.

¶ Orodes was so struck with the loss of this battle, and the death of his son, that he was almost out of his senses. For several days he neither opened his mouth, nor took any nourishment. When the excess of his grief was a little abated, and would permit him to speak, nothing was heard from him, but the name of Pacorus. He imagined that he saw him, and called to him ; he seemed to discourse with him ; and, as if he were living, to speak to him, and hear him speak. At other times, he remembered that he was dead, and shed a torrent of tears.

Never was grief more just. This was the most fatal blow for the Parthian monarchy it had ever received ; nor was the loss of the prince less than that of the army itself ; for he was the most excellent person the house of the Arsacides had ever produced, for justice, clemency, valor, and all the qualities which constitute the truly great prince. He had made himself so much beloved in Syria during the little time he resided there, that never did the people express more affection for any of their native sovereigns than for the person of this foreign prince.

¶ Orodes, repente filii morte et exercitus clade audita, ex dolore in furorem vertitur. Multis diebus non alloqui quenquam, non cibum sumere, non vocem mittere, ita ut etiam mutus factus videretur. Post multos deinde dies, ubi dolor vocem laxaverat, nihil aliud quam Pacorum vocabat. Pacorus illi videri, Pacorus audiri videbatur ; cum illo loqui, cum illo consistere. Interdum quasi amissum siebiliter dolebat. Justin.

When Orodes had a little recovered the dejection into which the death of his dear son Pacorus had thrown him, he found himself extremely embarrassed about the choice of his successor, out of his other children. He had thirty by different women, each of whom solicited him in favour of her own, and made use of all the ascendancy she had over a spirit impaired by age and affliction. At last, he determined however to follow the order of birth, and nominated Phraates, the eldest and most vicious of them all. ^w He had scarce taken possession of the throne, when he caused all his brothers, whom his father had by the daughter of Antiochus Eusebes, king of Syria, to be murdered, and that only because their mother was of a better family than his, and they had more merit than himself. The father, who was still alive, not being able to avoid professing extreme displeasure upon that occasion, that unnatural son ordered him also to be put to death. He treated the rest of his brothers in the same manner, and did not spare his own son, from the apprehension that the people would set him upon the throne in his stead. It was this prince, so cruel in regard to all his own family, that treated Hyrcanus, king of the Jews, with peculiar favour and clemency.

ARTICLE III.

ABRIDGMENT OF THE HISTORY OF THE KINGS OF CAPPADOCIA.

I HAVE spoken, in several parts of this history, of the kings of Cappadocia, according as I had occasion, but without mentioning either their beginning or succession.

I shall here unite in one point of view all that relates to that kingdom.

^x Cappadocia is a great country of Asia Minor. The Persians, under whom it was at first, had divided it into two parts, and established two satrapies or governments in it. The Macedonians, into whose possession it fell, suffered those two governments to be changed into kingdoms. The one extended toward mount Taurus, and was properly called Cappadocia, or Cappadocia Major; the other towards Pontus, and was called Cappadocia Pontica, or Cappadocia Minor. They were at length united into one kingdom.

Strabo says, that Ariarathes was the first king of Cappadocia, but does not mention at what time he began to reign. ^y It is probable that it was about the time Philip, father of Alexander the Great, began to reign in Macedonia, and Ochus in Persia; admitting that the kingdom of Cappadocia continued three hundred and seventy six years before it was reduced into a province of the Roman empire under Tiberius.

It was governed at first by a long succession of kings named Ariarathes, then by kings called Ariobarzanes, who did not exceed the third generation; and at length by the last, Archelaus. According to Diodorus Siculus, there were many kings of Cappadocia before Ariarathes; but as their history is almost entirely unknown, I shall make no mention of it in this place.

^z Ariarathes I. He reigned jointly with his brother Holophernes, for whom he had a particular affection.

^x Strab. l. xii. p. 533, 534.

^y A. M. 3644. Ant. J. C. 360.

^z A. M. 3644. Ant. J. C. 360.

^a Having joined the Persians in the expedition against Egypt, he acquired great glory, and returned home laden with honours, by king Ochus.

^b Ariarathes II. son of the former, had lived at peace in his dominions during the wars of Alexander the Great, who, out of impatience to come to blows with Darius, was unwilling to be delayed for the conquest of Cappadocia, and had contented himself with some instances of submission.

After that prince's death, Cappadocia, in the partition made of the provinces of his empire, by his generals, fell to Eumenes. Perdiccas, to put him in possession of it, conducted him thither at the head of a powerful army. Ariarathes, on his side, prepared for a vigorous defence. He had thirty thousand foot, and a numerous cavalry. They came to a battle. Ariarathes was defeated and taken prisoner. Perdiccas caused him, with his principal officers, to be crucified, and put Eumenes into possession of his dominions.

Ariarathes III. after the death of his father, escaped into Armenia.

^c As soon as he was apprized of the death of Perdiccus and Eumenes, and the employment the other wars gave Antigonus and Seleucus, he entered Cappadocia with troops lent him by Ardoates king of Armenia. He defeated Amyntas, general of the Macedonians, drove him out of the country, and reascended the throne of his ancestors.

^d Ariamnes his eldest son succeeded him. He entered into an alliance with Antiochus Theos, king of

^a A. M. 3653. Ant. J. C. 351.

^b A. M. 3668. Ant. J. C. 336. Plut. in Eumen. p. 548. Dioc. I. xviii. p. 599.

^c A. M. 3689. Ant. J. C. 315.

^d A. M. 3720. Ant. J. C. 284.

Syria, and married his eldest son to Stratonice, the daughter of the same Antiochus. He had so great an affection for this son that he made him his colleague in the kingdom.

Ariarathes IV. having reigned alone after the death of his father, left his dominions, when he died, to his son of the same name with himself, who was at that time very young.

^e Ariarathes V. He married Antiochis, daughter of Antiochus the Great, an artful princess, who, finding herself barren, had recourse to imposture. She deceived her husband, and made him believe that she had two sons, one of whom was called Ariarathes, and the other Holophernes.^f Her barrenness ceasing some time after, she had two daughters, and then one son, who was named Mithridates. She confessed the fraud to her husband, and sent one of the supposed children to be brought up at Rome, with a small train, and the other into Ionia. The true son took the name of Ariarathes, and was educated after the manner of the Greeks.

Ariarathes V. supplied his father in law, Antiochus king of Syria, with troops, in the war which he undertook against the Romans. Antiochus having been defeated, Ariarathes sent ambassadors to Rome ^g to ask the senate's pardon, for having been obliged to declare against the Romans in favour of his father in law. This was granted him, but not till after he had been condemned to pay, by way of expiation of his fault, two hundred talents, that is to say, two hundred thousand crowns. The senate afterwards abated him half that sum, at the request of Eumenes king of Pergamus, who had lately married his daughter.

^e A. M. 3814. Ant. J. C. 190.

^f He is called so by Polybius, and Orophernes by Diodorus Siculus.

^g Liv. l. xxxvii. n. 40. l. xxxviii. n. 37, and 39.

Ariarathes afterwards entered into an alliance with his son in law Eumenes, against Pharnaces king of Pontus. The Romans, who had rendered themselves arbiters of the kings of the east, sent ambassadors to transact a treaty between those three princes; but Pharnaces rejected their mediation. However, two years after, he was obliged to treat with Eumenes and Ariarathes upon conditions sufficiently hard.

The latter had a son of his own name, who loved him in the most tender manner, which occasioned his being surnamed Philopator, and for whom he had no less affection. He desired to give him a proof of it, in resigning the kingdom to him, and placing him upon the throne during his life. The son, who had all possible affection and respect for a father that so well deserved both, could not resolve to accept an offer so advantageous in the vulgar opinion of men, but a mortal wound to so good a heart as his; and represented to his father, that he was not one of those who could consent to reign during the life of him to whom he owed his being. Such examples of moderation, generosity, disinterestedness, and sincere affection for a father, are the more extraordinary, and were the more admired, as in the times of which we are now relating the history, inordinate ambition respected nothing, and boldly violated the most sacred ties of nature and religion.

Ariarathes VI. surnamed Philopator, reigned after his father's death, and was an excellent prince. ^h As soon as he ascended the throne, he sent an embassy to Rome to renew the alliance his father had contracted with the Romans, which he found no difficulty to obtain. He applied himself very closely to the study of philosophy, from whence Cappadocia, which, till then, had been unknown to the Greeks, became the residence of many learned men.

^h A. M. 3842. Ant. J. C. 162. Diod. in Eclog. l. xxxi. p. 865.

Demetrius, king of Syria, had a sister, whom Ariarathes refused to espouse, lest that alliance should give offence to the Romans. That refusal extremely prejudiced Demetrius against the king of Cappadocia. He soon found an occasion to be revenged, by supplying Holophernes with troops, who pretended himself the brother of Ariarathes,ⁱ expelled him from the throne, and after that violence reigned tyrannically. He put many to death, confiscated the estates of the greatest lords, and even plundered a temple of Jupiter, which had been revered by the people from time immemorial, and had never suffered such a violation before. Apprehending a revolution, which his cruelty gave him reason to expect, he deposited four hundred talents ^k with the inhabitants of Priene, a city of Ionia. Ariarathes had taken refuge at Rome, to implore aid of the Romans. The usurper sent his deputies thither also. The senate, according to the usual motives of their policy, decreed that the kingdom should be divided between the two brothers. Ariarathes found a more immediate and more effectual protector, in the person of Attalus king of Pergamus,^l who signalized the beginning of his reign by reestablishing this unfortunate prince upon the throne of his ancestors. Ariarathes, to revenge himself on the usurper, ⁱ Diod. in Excerpt. p. 334, and 336.

^k Four hundred thousand crowns. ^lA. M. 3845. Ant. J. C. 159.

was for obliging the inhabitants of Priene to deliver into his hands the four hundred talents Holophernes had left with them. They opposed that demand, with pleading the inviolable faith of deposits, which would not admit their giving up that sum to any one whatsoever, during the life of the person who had confided it to their keeping. Ariarathes had no regard to so just a representation, and laid waste their lands without mercy, notwithstanding which, so considerable a loss did not induce them to violate the fidelity they thought themselves obliged to observe in regard to him, who had confided that deposit with them.

^m Holophernes had retired to Antioch, where he joined in a conspiracy with the inhabitants of that city against Demetrius his benefactor, whose place he had conceived hopes of supplying. The conspiracy was discovered, and Holophernes imprisoned. Demetrius would have put him to death directly, if he had not judged it more advisable to reserve him, in order to make use of him afterwards in the pretensions he had upon Cappadocia, and the design he had formed of dethroning and destroying Ariarathes; but he was prevented by the plot contrived against him by the three kings of Egypt, Pergamus, and Cappadocia, who set Alexander Bala upon the throne in his stead.

ⁿ Ariarathes aided the Romans against Aristonicus, who had possessed himself of the kingdom of Pergamus, and perished in the war.

^m Justin. l. xxxv. c. 1.

ⁿ A. M. 3875. Ant. J. C. 129. Justin. l. xxxvii. c. 1.

He left six children, whom he had by Laodice. The Romans, in gratitude for the father's services, added Lycaonia and Cilicia to their dominions. Laodice, who was regent during the minority of these six princes, apprehending the loss of her authority when they should be of age to reign, poisoned five of them the same year their father died. She had treated the sixth in the same manner, if the vigilance of relations had not removed him from the fury of that unnatural mother. The people set him upon the throne, after having destroyed that cruel murderess of her children.

° Ariarathes VII. He married another Laodice, sister of Mithridates Eupater, and had two sons by her, Ariarathes VIII. and Ariarathes IX. His brother in law, caused him to be murdered by Gordius, one of his subjects. Laodice afterwards married Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, who immediately took possession of Cappadocia. Mithridates sent an army thither, drove out the garrisons of Nicomedes, and restored the kingdom to his nephew, the son of the same Ariarathes whom he had caused to be assassinated.

Ariarathes VIII. had scarce ascended the throne, when Mithridates pressed him to recal Gordius from banishment, with design to rid himself of the son by the same assassin who had killed the father. That young prince shuddered at the proposal, and raised an army to oppose the violence of his uncle. Mithridates being unwilling to decide his measures by the hazard of a battle, chose rather to draw Ariarathes to a conference, in which he assassinated him with a dagger concealed for that purpose, in the view of the two armies. He set his own son, of only eight years old, in his place, caused him to be called Ariarathes, and gave him Gordius for his governor.^p The Cappadocians, not being able to bear the vexations of the lieutenants of Mithridates, rose in arms, called in Ariarathes, the late king's brother, from Asia, and placed him upon the throne.

Ariarathes IX. Soon after his return, Mithridates attacked, overthrew, and expelled him the kingdom. That young prince's grief brought a distemper on him, of which he died soon after. Mithridates had reestablished his son upon the throne.

Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, apprehending that Mithridates, being in possession of Cappadocia, might fall upon his dominions, set up an infant of eight years old, to whom he also gave the name of Ariarathes, and sent deputies to the Romans to demand the kingdom of his father in his name. Queen Laodice his wife, went expressly to Rome to support the imposture, and to testify that she had three sons by Ariarathes VII. of whom this, which she produced, was the last. Mithridates, on his side, ventured to have assurances made by Gordius, that this son, whom he had placed upon the throne, was the son of that Ariarathes who had been killed in the war against Aristonicus. What times were these ! What a series is here of frauds and impostures ! The Roman people saw through them ; and, not to support them on either side, decreed that Mithridates should renounce Cappadocia, which for the future should enjoy its liberty, and govern itself as it thought proper. But the Cappadocians sent to Rome to declare that liberty was insupportable to them, and to demand a king. We may justly be astonished at the taste of a people who could prefer slavery to liberty ; but there are capricious and corrupt nations, to which the monarchical is better adapted than the republican government ; and there are few people who are wise enough to make a moderate use of perfect and entire liberty. The Cappadocians elected, or rather received from the Romans, Ariobarzanes for their king, whose family was extinct at the third generation.

^p Justin. l. xxxviii. c. 2.

¹ Ariobarzanes I. This new prince did not enjoy his dignity in peace. Mithraas and Bagoas, generals of Tigranes, drove him out of Cappadocia, and reinstated Ariarathes, son of Mithridates. The Romans caused Ariobarzanes to be reinstated. He was expelled some time after by an army sent by Mithridates into Cappadocia, in favour of his son. Sylla, having obtained great advantages over Mithridates, compelled him to abandon Cappadocia. Some time after, at the instigation of that prince, Tigranes invaded that kingdom, and carried off three hundred thousand men, to whom he gave lands in Armenia. ^r Ariobarzanes, who had escaped to Rome before the invasion, was not restored till Pompey had put an end to the war with Mithridates.

Ariobarzanes II. Pompey had considerably enlarged the dominions of Ariobarzanes, when he replaced him on the throne of Cappadocia. His son succeeded to all that great inheritance, but did not keep it long ; he was killed some time before Cicero went to command in Cilicia. The prince who reigned at that time was Ariobarzanes III. grandson of Ariobarzanes I.

¹ A. M. 3915. Ant. J. C. 89. Appian. in Mithr. p. 176, &c. Justin. l. xxxvij. c. 3. Plut. in Sylla.

^r A. M. 3938. Ant. J. C. 66.

Ariobarzanes III. * Cicero, upon quitting Rome, had received orders to favour and protect Ariobarzanes with all possible care, as a prince whose welfare was dear to the senate and people ; a glorious testimonial, which had never before been granted to any king. Cicero punctually executed the order of the senate. When he arrived in Cilicia, Ariobarzanes was menaced with being killed, as his father had been. A conspiracy was on foot against him in favour of his brother Ariarathes. The latter declared to Cicero, that he had no part in that plot ; that indeed he had been earnestly solicited to accept the kingdom, but that he had always been infinitely averse to such thoughts during the life of his brother, who had no issue. Cicero employed the authority of his office, and all the credit his high reputation gave him, to dispel the storm with which the king was threatened. † His endeavours were successful ; he saved the king's life and crown by his constancy, and a generous disinterestedness, which rendered him inaccessible to all the attempts that were made to corrupt his integrity, and to make him change sides. The greatest danger came from the high priest of Comana. There were two principal cities of that name, the one in Cappadocia, and the other in the kingdom of Pontus.‡ They were consecrated to Belona, and observed almost the same ceremonies in the worship of that goddess. The one was formed upon the model of the other ; that of Pontus upon that of Cappadocia. It is of the latter we speak in this place. The temple of that goddess was endowed with great estates, and served by a great number of persons, under the authority of a pontiff, a man of great credit, and so considerable, that only the king was his superior ; he was generally of the blood royal. His dignity was for life. Strabo says, that in his time there were above six thousand persons consecrated to the service of this temple. From hence the high priest was so powerful ; and ^v in the time of which we speak, might have occasioned a very dangerous war, and involved Ariobarzanes in great difficulties, had he thought proper to defend himself by force of arms, as it was believed he would ; for he had troops, both horse and foot, ready to take the field, with great funds to pay and subsist them. But Cicero, by his prudence, prevailed upon him to retire out of the kingdom, and to leave Ariobarzanes in the peaceable possession of it.

* A. M. 3953. Ant. J. C. 51. Cic. Epist. 2, et 4. l. xiv. ad Famil. et Epist. 20. l. v. ad Attic.

† Ariobarzanes opera mea vivit, regnat Ἐν παροδῶ consilio et auctoritate, et quod proditoribus ejus απροσιτον με, non modo αδαροδοκηταν πραβui, regem, regnumque servavi. Cic. Epist. 20. l. v. ad Attic.

‡ Strab. l. xii. p. 535 et 557.

During the civil war between Cesar and Pompey, Ariobarzanes marched with some troops to the latter, who were present at the battle of Pharsalia. This, no doubt, was the reason that Cesar laid Ariobarzanes under contribution. It is certain that he exacted very considerable sums of money from him ; ^w for that prince represented to him that it would be impossible for him to pay them if Pharnaces continued to plunder Cappadocia. Cesar was then in Egypt; from whence he set out to reduce Pharnaces to reason. He passed through Cappadocia, and made such regulations there, as imply that Ariobarzanes and his brother were in no very good understanding, and entirely subjected the latter to the authority of the former. After Cesar had conquered Pharnaces,^x he gave part of Cilicia and Armenia to Ariobarzanes.

^v Cum magnum bellum in Cappadocia concitaretur, si sacerdos armis se, quod facturus putabatur, defenderet adolescens et equitatu et pediatu et pecunia paratus, et toto, iis qui novari aliquid volebant, perfecti ut e regno ille discederet ; rexque sine tumultu ac sine armis, omni auctoritate aulæ communita, regnum cum dignitate obtineret. Cic. Epist. 4. lib. xv. ad Famil.

^w Cesar de Bell. Civ. l. iii. Hist. de Bell. Alex.

^y This good treatment gave the murderers of Cesar reason to believe that the king of Cappadocia would not favour their party. He did not openly declare against them; but he refused to enter into their alliance.

This conduct gave them a just diffidence of him; so that Cassius thought it incumbent upon him not to spare him. He attacked him, and having taken him prisoner, put him to death.

Ariarathes X. By the death of Ariobarzanes, the kingdom of Cappadocia remained to his brother Ariarathes. The possession of it was disputed with him by Sisinna, the eldest son of Glaphyra, wife of Archelaus, high priest of Bellona, at Comana in Cappadocia. This Archelaus was the grandson of Archelaus, a Cappadocian by nation, and general of an army in Greece for Mithridates against Sylla. He abandoned the party of Mithridates in the second war, as we shall relate in the twenty second book,^z and joined the Romans. He left one son, also named Archelaus, who married Berenice, queen of Egypt, and was killed six months after in a battle. He obtained a very honourable dignity of Pompey, which was the high priesthood of Comana in Cappadocia. His son Archelaus possessed it after him. He married Glaphyra, a lady of extraordinary beauty, and had two sons by her, Sisinna and Archelaus. ^a They first disputed the kingdom of Cappadocia with Ariarathes, who possessed it. Mark Anthony was the judge of this difference, and determined it in favour of Sisinna. What became of him is not known; history only tells us, that Ariarathes reascended the throne. Five or six years after, Mark Anthony expelled him,^b and set Archelaus, the second son of Glaphyra, upon the throne.

^x Diod. l. xlii. p. 183.

^y A. M. 3962. Ant. J. C. 42. Diod. l. 47.

^z Strab. l. xii. p. 558. Diod. l. xxxix. p. 116.

Archelaus. ^c That prince became very powerful. He expressed his gratitude to Mark Anthony, by joining him with good troops at the battle of Actium. He was so fortunate, notwithstanding that conduct, to escape the resentment of Augustus. He was suffered to keep possession of Cappadocia, and was almost the only one treated with so much favour.

^d He assisted Tiberius to reestablish Tigranes in Armenia, and obtained of Augustus, Armenia Minor, and a great part of Cilicia. Tiberius rendered him great services with Augustus, especially when his subjects brought accusations against him before that prince. He pleaded his cause himself, and was the occasion of his gaining it. Archelaus fixed his residence in the island of Eleusis near the coast of Cilicia,

^a A. M. 3963. Ant. J. C. 41. Appian. de Bell. Civ. l. v. p. 675.

^b A. M. 3968. Ant. J. C. 36. Diod. l. xlix. p. 411.

^c A. M. 3973. Ant. J. C. 31. Plut. in Anton. p. 944.

^d A. M. 3984. Ant. J. C. 20. Joseph. Antiq. l. xv. c. 5. Diod. l. liv. p. 526. Sueton. in Tib. c. viii. Diod. l. lvii. p. 614. Strab. l. xiv. p. 671 and l. xii. p. 556.

and having married Pythodoris, the widow of Polemon, king of Pontus, he considerably augmented his power. For as the sons of Polemon were infants at that time, he had undoubtedly the administration of their kingdom jointly with their mother.

^e His reign was very long and happy; but his latter years were unfortunate in effect of Tiberius's revenge. That prince, who saw with pain that Caius and Lucius, the sons of Agrippa, grandsons of Augustus, and his sons by adoption, were raised by degrees above him;^f to avoid giving umbrage to the two young Cesars, and to spare himself the mortification of being witness to their aggrandizement, demanded and obtained permission to retire to Rhodes, under pretext that he had occasion to withdraw from business and the hurry of Rome for the reestablishment of his health. His retreat was considered as a real banishment, and people began to neglect him as a person in disgrace, and did not believe it safe to appear his friends. ^g During his stay at Rhodes, king Archelaus, who was not very remote from thence, residing generally at Eleusis,^h paid him no honours, forgetting the great obligations he had to him. It was not, says Tacitus, out of pride or ^e A. M. 3988. Ant. J. C. 16. Diod. in Excerpt. p. 662. Sueton in Tib. c. 10. Vall. Patere. l. ii. c. 99.

^f Ne fulgor suus orientium juvenum obstaret initiis, dissimulata causa consilii sui, commeatum ab socero atque eodem vitrico acquiescendi a continuatione laborum petiit. Petarc. l. ii. c. 39.

^g Rex Archelaus quinquagesimum annum Cappadocia potiebatur, invsus Tiberio, quodeum Rhodi agentem nullo officio colusset. Nec id Archelaus per superbiam omiserat, sed ab intimis Augusti monitus; quia florente Caio Cesare missoque ad res Orientis, intuta Tiberii amicitia credebatur. Tacit. Annal. l. ii. c. 42.

^h Eleusis was but six leagues distant from Rhodes. Strab. l. xiv. p. 651.

haughtiness, but by the advice of Augustus's principal friends, who believed the amity of Tiberius dangerous at that time. On the contrary,ⁱ when young Caius Cesar, appointed governor of the east, was sent into Armenia by Augustus, to appease the troubles of that country, Archelaus, who looked upon him as the future successor to the empire, paid him all kind of honours, and distinguished himself by the zeal with which he paid his court to him. Politicians are often mistaken in their conjectures, for want of a clear insight into futurity. It had been more consistent with prudence and wisdom in Archelaus to have observed such a conduct as had been agreeable to each of the princes, who might both arrive at the empire. Something of this nature is observed of Pomponius Atticus,^k who, during the divisions with which the republic was torn at different times, always knew how to render himself agreeable to both parties.

Tiberius never forgot the injurious preference that had been given to his rival, which was the more offensive to him as it argued an ungrateful disposition in Archelaus. He made him highly sensible of this when he became master. Archelaus was cited to Rome,^l as having endeavoured to excite troubles in the province. Livia wrote to him; and without dissembling

ⁱ A. M. 4002. Ant. J. C. 2.

^k Hoc quale sit, facilius existimabit is, qui judicare quantæ sit sapientiæ, eorum retinere usum benevolentiamque inter quos maximarum rerum non solum æmulatio, sed obtrectatio tanto intercedebat, quantum fuit incidere necesse inter Cæsarum atque Antonium, cum se uterque principem non solum urbis Romanæ sed orbis terrarum esse cuperet Corn. Nep. in Attic. c. 20.

^l A. M. 4020. A. D. 16.

the emperor's anger, gave him hopes of pardon, provided he came in person to demand it. This was a snare laid for drawing him out of his kingdom. ^m The king of Cappadocia either did not perceive it, or dared not act as if he did. He set out for Rome, was very ill received by Tiberius, and saw himself proceeded against as a criminal. Dion assures us, that Archelaus, depressed with age, was generally believed to have lost his reason; but that in reality he was perfectly in his senses, and counterfeited the mad man, because he saw no other means of saving his life. The senate passed no sentence against him; but age, the gout, and, more than these, the indignity of the treatment he was made to suffer, soon occasioned his death. He had reigned fifty two years. After his death Cappadocia was reduced into a province of the Roman empire.

This kingdom was very powerful. The revenues of Cappadocia were so considerable when Archelaus died, that Tiberius thought himself able, from his new acquisition, to abate the half of a tax he had caused to be levied. He even gave that province some relief, and would not exact from it all the duties it had paid the last king.

The kings of Cappadocia generally resided at Mazaca,ⁿ a city situate upon the mountain Argea, and

^m Ille ignarus doli, vel si intelligere videretur, vim metuens, in urbem properat; exceptusque immitti a principe, et mox accusatus a senatu; non ob crimina, quæ singebantur, sed angore, simul fessus senio, et quia regibus æqua, nedum infima, insolita sunt, finem vitæ sponte an fato implevit. Tacit. Annal. l. ii. c. 42.

ⁿ Strab. l. xii. p. 537—539.

governed by the laws of Charondas.^o This city was built upon the river Melas, which empties itself into the Euphrates. A king of Cappadocia, whom Strabo only calls Ariarathes, without mentioning the time when he lived, having filled up the mouths of this river, it overflowed all the neighbouring country; after which, he caused small islands to be made in it, after the manner of the Cyclades, where he passed part of his life in puerile diversions. The river broke the dams of its mouths; and the waters returned into their channel. The Euphrates, having received them, overflowed, and did incredible damage in Cappadocia. The Galatians, who inhabited Phrygia, suffered also great losses by that torrent; for which they insisted upon being made amends.

They demanded three hundred talents of the king of Cappadocia, and made the Romans their judges.

^p Cappadocia abounded with horses, asses, and mules. It was from thence the horses were brought, so particularly allotted for the use of the emperors, that the consuls themselves were forbid to have any of them. It furnished also great numbers of ^q slaves and false witnesses. The Cappadocians were reported to accustom themselves to the bearing of torments from their infancy, and to put one another to the question by the rack and other methods of torture, in order to insure themselves against the pains their false witnesses might one day expose them to suffer. This people exceeded the Greek nation in perjury,^r though the latter had carried that vice to a great height, if we may believe Cicero, who ascribes to them the having made this manner of speaking common amongst them; “Lend me your evidence, and ° I will pay you with mine.”

^o This Charondas was a celebrated legislator of Græcia Major, of whom mention has been made.

^p Boch. Phaleg. l. iii. c. 11. Schol. Persii.

^q Mancipiis locuples eget æris Cappadocum rex. Horat.

Cappadocia, generally speaking, was far from being a country of great geniuses and learned men. It has produced, however, some very celebrated authors. Strabo and Pausanias are of that number. It was believed especially, that the Cappadocians were very unfit for the profession of orators; and it became a proverb, that a ^r rhetorician of that country was as hard to be found, as a white raven or a flying tortoise. S. Basil and S. Gregory Nazianzen are exceptions to this rule.

^r Cic. pro Flac. n. 9, 10. ° Da mihi testimonium mutuum.

^z Θαπτον την λευκην κορακας πτηνας τε χελωνας
Ευρειν, η δεκίμων ρητορα Καππαδοκην.

Belles Lettres.

HASTINGS, ETHERIDGE & BLISS,

State Street, Boston ;

AND AT THEIR STORE IN CHARLESTOWN,

PROPOSE TO PUBLISH,

THE

METHOD OF TEACHING AND STUDYING THE

BELLES LETTRES ;

OR, AN INTRODUCTION TO

Languages, Poetry, Rhetoric, History, Moral Philosophy, Physics, &c.

WITH REFLECTIONS ON TASTE,

AND INSTRUCTIONS WITH REGARD TO THE ELOQUENCE OF THE PULPIT, THE BAR, AND THE STAGE.

THE WHOLE ILLUSTRATED WITH PASSAGES FROM THE MOST FAMOUS POETS AND ORATORS, ANCIENT AND MOD-ERN ; WITH CRITICAL REMARKS ON THEM.

BY MR. ROLLIN,

Late Principal of the University of Paris, Professor of Eloquence in the Royal College, and Member of the Royal Academy of Inscriptions and Belles Lettres.

The Eleventh Edition, Translated from the French.

EXTRACT FROM THE TRANSLATOR'S ADVERTISEMENT.

"THE work we here present the reader, has already acquired so great a reputation, that it would perhaps be impertinent to attempt a panegyric of it at this time ; for the most learned and ingenious journalists have honoured it with the highest and most just encomiums in their periodical pieces, and applauded it as one of the completest treatises ever published on the subject of polite literature. Nor have particular writers of the greatest fame, and the finest taste, been wanting in their praises of it. In short, were we to transcribe all the eulogiums which have been made on this composition, we should write a volume, instead of a prospectus. If ever a writer strewed the paths to science with roses, it is Mr. Rollin." He observes further of him, as a tutor in the College at Paris. "Thrice happy the pupils, who were under the tuition of a gentleman, in whom knowledge and sweetness of temper are so agreeably blended !

"He discovers so consummate a knowledge in the several arts he professed, that, to consider him in this light, one would conclude he had never stirred out of a college ; and on the other side, so much of the gentleman, in the dress of his style and diction, that one would imagine he had spent his whole life at courts."

Select Miscellaneous Classicks.

HASTINGS, ETHERIDGE & BLISS,

NO. 8, STATE STREET, BOSTON;

AND AT THEIR BOOKSTORE IN CHARLESTOWN,

ARE PUBLISHING BY SUBSCRIPTION,

In 60 volumes, Duodecimo, to be ornamented with Plates, engraved by the first American Artists;

ENTITLED,

“Select Miscellaneous Classicks.”

COMPRISING THE ENTIRE WORKS OF

POPE, SWIFT, SMOLLET, ADDISON, GOLDSMITH, JOHNSON, STERNE, AND FIELDING.

PROSPECTUS.

THE MISCELLANEOUS CLASSICKS are intended to comprise the above valuable and approved authors. Seven volumes of Pope's works are already published, as a specimen of the size, and style of execution, of this undertaking. The publishers intend issuing the residue to match these volumes, so as to complete an uniform set of these valuable and scarce books, which are intended to form a complete little Library of the choicest writings in the English language. This plan offers to the publick a cheap and easy mode of procuring the best books, at a very reasonable price, by taking a volume at a time. The payment will be divided in such a manner as will put it in the power of almost every one to purchase it by subscribing. To those who do not subscribe, the price will be raised 25 per cent at least.

* * Any person having other editions of any of these authors, may have the privilege of taking such only as they have not; or theirs will be taken at a fair price, in part payment.

ALSO IN PRESS,

AN ESSAY ON THE HISTORY OF CIVIL SOCIETY.

BY ADAM FERGUSON;

Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Edinburgh.

JUST PUBLISHED AS ABOVE,

A new 8vo. edition of the BIBLE, on a fine paper and new type; also, a number on an inferior quality of paper.

A new edition of WATTS' PSALMS & HYMNS in miniature, on a superfine wove paper. Also, a good edition on paper a little inferior, and a common edition to sell very low; each of which have been printed on a new and beautiful minion type.

HASTINGS, ETHERIDGE and BLISS, keep constantly for sale, an extensive assortment of BOOKS, in every department of literature; beside a variety of FANCY ARTICLES; all of which they are determined to sell on as liberal terms as can be had at any other Bookstore. Constant and unremitting attention given, and every favour gratefully acknowledged.

BOSTON, March 20, 1809.

